Stephen McBride is an associate in the intellectual property litigation practice group and joined Cooley in 2011. His practice focuses on patent litigation, and he has represented clients in forums including US district courts, the International Trade Commission, and arbitrations. He has experience litigating patents in a number of industries with a focus on technologies related to the Internet, telecommunications, electronics and software.

Before joining Cooley, Stephen was an associate in the New York office of Latham & Watkins. Prior to law school, he worked as an engineer designing wireless communication networks for Agilent Technologies.

While at Columbia University School of Law, he was a Stone Scholar and served as notes editor for the Columbia Science and Technology Law Review.
