Dedication

I dedicate this book to my writing teachers:

To my father and mother, who taught me to speak "the King's English,"

To Miss Roberts, my second grade teacher, who, in an effort to help me stop missing writing deadlines, sat me down one afternoon and taught me the difference between long and short vowels;

To Miss McDougal, my seventh grade teacher, who was possibly the last English teacher in America to teach her students how to diagram a sentence;

To Miss Karl, my eleventh grade English teacher, a flint-edged old battle-ax whom I didn't much like, and who didn't care if I liked her or not, who espoused a five-step method for organizing an essay which I still use today, and who opened my eyes when she showed me how to rearrange a few-words-here and a-couple-sentences-there to turn a god-awful first draft (my junior theme, for which she charitably gave me a D minus) into something passably good—the following year, I wrote a paper that I am still proud of today, and three years later, a college professor accused me of plagiarizing an essay that I submitted (no student as mediocre as I, she thought, could have written such a good essay on my own, but I showed her my research materials and proved my authorship)—thank you, Miss Karl;

To Jim McConnell, my first-year legal writing instructor, who taught me to write short, clear sentences that even a judge could understand, and never to use the word "subsequently" when "later" would do, and never, ever to use the word "said" as an adjective, as in "the said party did thus-and-such"—and, Jim, I haven't;

To Pam Woldow, my law partner and the best-ever legal writing partner, who taught me the value of writing a third draft—about the only reason I can think of why I would ever want to return to the practice of law would be to collaborate again with Pam in the creation of a pristine legal brief, knowing that the judge would be too busy to read it, but hoping to find the magical combination of words that would catch his eye, drag him in, and take his breath away;

And most of all, to Jane Calabria, my wife, who built the fire under me and kept it hot; without Jane's inspiration, vision, and encouragement, I could never have written this book at all, or the others. Now, if only I could learn from Jane how to meet a writing deadline....
