BODY:

They were originally made famous by General MacArthur during the Korean War. Then Tom Cruise renewed their popularity in the movie Top Gun. Just like flares and halter necks, aviator sunglasses are making a fashion comeback.

The best dressed will be in frameless aviators, or shields, in lens shades of every hue. Just think of the women in Robbie Williams's Rock DJ video or Anastasia and you've got the picture.

David Bearpark, of Bearpark Optical, says most brands are now doing aviator styles. "Sunglasses have become a little bit bigger now. We've done that smaller look."

Overseas, the unisex thing is over and women are going for the more feminine Jackie O-type styles. Light-tinted lenses, like pink, blue, yellow, and orange, and graduated lenses, are very much the rage, and it is important you have the right sunglasses for your lifestyle. Mixing your Nike shades with your business suit is not a good look. The good news is, you can own more than one pair.

Mr Bearpark says there are three basic types of sunglasses: the fashion shape brands like DKNY, Armani, Gucci, and Dior; the sports brands like Oakley, Nike, Adidas, and Anarchy; and the fashion styles more influenced by lens quality, such as Serengeti and Revo, who claim to make the best lenses in the world.

Leaping out of the fisherman's closet is the polarised lens, a surprise option which most brands have begun offering in the last six months. All Nautica lenses are polarised.

Of course, with the hole in the ozone layer getting bigger over New Zealand, shades are not a frivolous accessory. Protecting your retina from the damaging effects of the sun is important. Luckily, there are plenty of options for looking style while looking after your vision.

Hot brands for this year include relative newcomers to the New Zealand market -- DKNY, Nike, Oakley, Diesel, and Gucci.

Brent Rushworth, of Arthur Cocks and Company, says Dior and Gucci both have new designers who are moving the fashion houses into the younger market. Frameless shields are big looks for both this season.

Carrera is also looking to rebrand and broaden their appeal to more than the mature man market.

OPSM say its latest collection of ONYX sunglasses have been inspired by European trends -- sleek and sculptural with modern lines designed to mould the face shape.

Highlight colours include mid-blue, crystal burgundy, antique silver, milk chocolate, several shades of tortoiseshell, and black. Trims are understated, and sleek chrome temple trims add a designer touch.

HIGH POINT, N.C. - You almost expect Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers to come twirling by in some of the market showrooms. Decked out in sleek contemporary furnishings, these pared-down vignettes look like a set for one of those classic midcentury movies, in which everyone lives in a streamlined Manhattan penthouse.

West Coast designer Barbara Barry jump-started the trend in the '90s with her ongoing Hollywood-inspired collection for Baker. Now at the fall International Home Furnishings Market the dominant mood in modern is sophisticated and smooth, dark woods accented with jewelrylike hardware.

In fact, at Drexel Heritage, the First Avenue Collection features pulls and handles that bring to mind David Yurman's stylish sterling and gold jewelry. The chunky pulls would make killer earrings, and every fashion-minded woman visiting the showroom coveted the twisted silver cable handles for bracelets.

Vicki Solada, vice president of product at Drexel Heritage, compared the exquisite hardware on the gently curved walnut drawer fronts to "the perfect piece of jewelry adorning the perfect black dress."

Following up his smashingly successful debut collection for Hickory Chair a year ago, New York designer Thomas O'Brien added the Greenwich Studio group this market. Clean lines and understated detail characterize most of the pieces. One of the stars of the collection, the oval Darlington Desk with open side shelves, features dark flamed mahogany veneer polished to a mirror shine.

At John Widdicomb, Larry Laslo, another New Yorker known for modern designs reminiscent of the 1930s, '40s and '50s, turned to the neoclassics for inspiration. He called his Novecento Collection "traditional with modern touches."

Predicting a return to ornamentation and detail, but not in a heavy-handed manner, Laslo said, "We simplified ourselves into oblivion in the '90s." His elliptical-shaped cocktail table is adapted from a 1929 design by Italian architect Gio Ponti and looks quite modern. The striking sideboard with brass overlay detailing, inspired by a 1931 Ponti design, would add refreshing decoration to a room full of no-frills contemporary furnishings.

David Chu's good-looking Nautica Home Horizons group for Lexington has a more clean-lined, cosmopolitan style than the earlier Nautica Home West-Indies-influenced designs. The dark cherry veneers are accented, but not upstaged, by woven rattan inserts, leather or metal. The four-poster bed with grid-style headboard would add drama to any bedroom.

Several new twists turned up at this market with the popular ottomans used as cocktail tables. At Baker, the Barbara Barry Introductions included a big, flat ottoman - 45 inches by 34 inches - upholstered in stitched leather squares, with a lower slatted shelf that can hold many magazines, books and newspapers.

Most cocktail ottomans are shown with a tray on top holding glasses and other items that would normally sit on a table. Barry included a handsome, oversized wood tray with her ottoman, an idea that also showed up in several other showrooms.

At Thayer Coggin, the boxy upholstered ottoman in the Metropolitan Collection is available with either simple cast aluminum legs to match the sofa or big rubber casters with a wood-look center. Those wheels can come in handy when relocating an ottoman 48 inches square or 28 inches wide by 70 inches long.

Another handy Metropolitan feature comes with the tete-a-tete, a sofa with backrests on opposite sides at each end, originally designed so two people could face each other to talk. This version, however, provides removable pivoting computer tables on the armrests (attachable cupholders optional), for computer-oriented types who prefer checking e-mail on a laptop to conversation.

HEADLINE: DO IT FRIDAY NOVEMBER 10

BYLINE: PHOEBE FLOWERS, Street Staff

BODY:

* This weekend, the 13th Annual MAKA 11:11 International Conference descends upon the Miccosukee Resort & Convention Center. The event, in its first incarnation in the eastern United States, is composed of three full days of lectures by more than 21 speakers on subjects including UFO phenomenon, "mediumnity" (which neither you nor the dictionary probably knew was even a word), Native American magical traditions, holistic medicine and hypnotherapy. Plus, you won't want to miss Chief Standing Elk, sacred pipe carrier and spiritual leader of the Dakota Nation, who will share his interpretation of the 11:11 symbols "Macah Wicahpe Wicohan." (A fun fact: "MAKA" means "earth.") Lectures run from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. Friday, Saturday and Sunday at the convention center, 500 SW 177th Ave., Miami. Call 305-374-3692.

* The FIU Music Festival 2000 is still going on, and Friday marks Polish Night, which is being touted as one of the festival highlights. The evening will feature Polish art, chamber music, delicacies, displays and a visiting entourage of musicians from Krakow, Poland, in case you were wondering, is a country about the size of New Mexico, and it has given birth to thousands of folk songs, a thousand folk dances and piano master Chopin. If you're worried about getting an authentic Polish experience, rest assured that Miami's American Institute of Polish Culture will be there to keep it real. Along with every other event of the festival, which runs through Nov. 17, Polish Night takes place at the Herbert and Nicole Wertheim Performing Arts Center, FIU University Park Campus, Miami. Call 305-348-1998 or visit www.fiumusicfestival.com.

* Not to be outdone by their academic neighbors, the University of Miami's First French Theatre Festival continues to rage on with an English-language adaptation of Antigone by Jean Anouilh, crazy French existential playwright. The updated version of a Greek tragedy about a heroine who chooses death over dishonor was first performed in 1944 Nazi-occupied Paris. There are ample opportunities to see the play: It shows Friday, Saturday and Tuesday - Nov. 18. Tickets are $12-$14 for adults, $10-$12 for students and seniors. It's at the Jerry Herman Ring Theatre, 1380 Miller Dr., Coral Gables. Call 305-284-3355.

SATURDAY

NOVEMBER 11

* The Streets of Mayfair of Coconut Grove launches a thrilling new farmers market Saturday. Buy fruits, vegetables, flowers, baked goods, nuts or candy, and check out art by local artisans. It's free, and it's a good excuse to wander outside in the lovely November weather. Check it out from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. outdoors on the Mayfair Promenade in the center of Coconut Grove. Call 305-448-1700 for more information.

* The Sixth Annual FLA/BRA (Florida/Brazil) Festival of Tigertail Productions winds down this weekend; come commemorate the final days with Change of Skin, a nine-minute interactive dance work at the Museum of Contemporary Art. The performance features Brazilian dancer-choreographer Vera Sala and Miami musician/composer Alfredo Triff, along with a 15-foot reticulated snake-like wooden sculpture by Brazilian artist Ricardo Ribenboim. In case you didn't catch it the first time - this involves a giant wooden snake, and thus cannot be missed. See it at 11:30 a.m., 1 p.m. or 3 p.m. Saturday; 1 p.m. or 3 p.m. Sunday. Also, 1:30 p.m. Saturday you can check out a panel discussion called Cultural Comparisons Regarding "New" in Latin America and South Florida, whatever that means. Everything is free with MoCA admission. The museum is located at 770 NE 125th St. in North Miami. Call 305-893-6211.

* So, Books & Books on the Beach is hosting an event featuring James Spada, who created the book Black & White Men. It's full of pictures of naked men. Young men. They're not professional models, but you can bet they're plenty pretty anyway. At Saturday's book discussion, Spada is going to do some talking about light and shadow, but you can just smile vacantly and stare at the pictures. Of the young, attractive, naked men. Books & Books is at 933 Lincoln Rd., Miami Beach. The evening begins at 7, but you might want to get there early. Call 305-532-3222 or e-mail info@booksandbooks.com.

* Saturday night marks the second Full Moon Party at Baraboo Restaurant, 7300 Ocean Terr., Miami Beach. This is an event that was inspired by Iemanjá, the Brazilian goddess of the waters. Brazilian chef Paolo Barroso de Barros is going to create a three-course prix fixe menu (that includes a wondrous Caipirinha) for $35 per person. The full-moon madness gets under way with seatings at 7 and 9:30 p.m., and concludes after dinner with a drum procession to the beach, where each guest has to throw a white rose into the ocean. Reservations and a sense of your own importance in the universe are recommended. Call 305-867-4242.

SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 12

* If you skipped Saturday's farmers market at Mayfair, then clearly you'll need to atone for your sins by attending the Antique and Collectibles Market from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Lincoln Road, Miami Beach. Art, jewelry, statuary, china, furnishings, household items, unusual vintage clothing, collectibles and more will all be offered for your perusal and potential purchase. It happens at Washington Avenue and Lincoln Road (the 400 block), and it's free. Call 305-673-4991.

WEDNESDAY
NOVEMBER 15

* Modernist Karel Teige, leader of the 20th Century Czech avant-garde, has his work showcased at the exhibition Dreams and Disillusionment: Karel Teige and the Czech Avant-Garde. The event, opening Wednesday with a reception and lecture, includes a full-scale model of Teige's landmark minimalist dwelling, Surrealist collages, and typographic experiments and graphic design. The slide lecture is at 6 p.m.; the reception at 7. The Wolfsonian-FIU, 1001 Washington Ave., Miami Beach, hosts the opening. It's free for members and FIU faculty/students, and $10 for others. Call 305-535-2645.

THURSDAY
NOVEMBER 16

* Miami Art Museum's Fourth Birthday Bash takes place in conjunction with JAM at MAM, fortuitously enough. From 5 to 9 p.m. check out the unveiling of Converge, the new MAM publication; a Nautica fashion show; performances by saxophone great James Carter; a birthday cake; a donation bar featuring some sort of special martinis not yet named; and docent-led gallery tours of Selections from the Collection. No cover. 101 W. Flagler St., Miami. Call 305-375-3000 or visit www.miamiartmuseum.org.

November 13, 2000, Atlantic Edition

SECTION: ASIA; Pg. 44

LENGTH: 645 words

BYLINE: By George Wehrfritz; With Kay Itoi in Tokyo

HIGHLIGHT:

They come from all over Japan to reach this factory outlet

BODY:

As typhoon Xangsane bore down on Japan last Wednesday, wine wholesaler Kenichi Sotohira packed his wife and young son into the family car and drove more than 100 kilometers--to go shopping. Their destination: a picturesque resort town at the base of Mount Fuji where American entrepreneurs have turned a rusty amusement park into Japan's hottest discount mall. The sprawling complex, called Gotemba Premium Outlets, sits in a forest beneath a huge Ferris wheel. Seventy-eight stores, including outlets for Nike, Lands' End, North Face and the Gap, line an open-air Main Street filled rain or shine with bargain hunters. Each day cars and tour buses jam eight muddy parking lots. "I'm buying ties and sweaters," says Sotohira as he waits for his wife outside the Nautica store. "Everything is 20, 30, even 40 percent cheaper than retail."

Japanese discovered outlet malls at overseas vacation destinations like Hawaii, Florida and New York. Yet only now, thanks to cheaper land and looser regulations, is the concept taking root on their native soil. Developers hope to reinvigorate Japan's bleak shopping landscape, where according to official statistics retail sales have fallen for 42 consecutive months. Thanks to a decade-long recession, Japanese households are earning less and saving more. That means they're spending a whole lot less. "They don't always need to buy the newest thing," says Motomu Oniyanagi, a marketing executive at Chelsea Japan Co., creators of the Gotemba mall. "We're seeing what we call 'smart shopping'."

Gotemba has been swamped since it opened for business in July. Over the first two weeks it attracted some 800,000 visitors, or nearly half Chelsea's expected first-year business. During October alone more than 1,000 tour buses disgorged eager shoppers. Huge crowds have snarled traffic and, on two occasions, overloaded Gotemba's sewage-treatment system. (Banks of chemical toilets were shipped in to prevent further waste problems.) To avoid gridlock on the Tomei Expressway, a major transportation artery, the mall's Web site now discourages shoppers from visiting on weekends. "It's crowded all day, every day," says a woman who staffs a tourist desk set up in the mall to promote local beer and sake breweries. "People come here from all over Japan."

Gotemba's main appeal is its vast array of "red tag" discounts. Muji, Japan's no-name fashion sensation, offers $8 cotton shirts and cheap candles. At Nike's outlet store, running shoes start at about $40. At Coach, the American handbag designer, one of the hottest products is a $180 doggie raincoat. At the center of it all sits a vast food bazaar that offers burgers, noodles, beer and sake. Shoppers dine in a ski-lodge-like hall with an open-beam ceiling, a crackling central fire pit and moose heads mounted on one wall.

Chelsea, which operates 21 outlet malls in the United States, invested $46 million to get the Gotemba complex built and running. With 35,000 to 50,000 shoppers now visiting daily, first-year sales are expected to exceed the company's pre-opening target of $140 million. Local officials forecast that the mall will draw 6 million visitors and inject $500 million into the local economy annually.

The outlet-mall concept is catching. In Makuhari, a convention-center district located near Tokyo Disneyland, a new outlet mall called Garden Walk opened last month to huge crowds. Later this month Chelsea will open its second mall in Japan, called the Rinku Premium Outlets, near Osaka. Will outlets change retail? pondered a Yomiuri Shimbun headline last week. The article concluded that "consumers are willing to spend their money on luxury items that are discounted and quality items that are inexpensive." They've been doing that for years at malls across America. Now, finally, they can shop a bit closer to home.

BODY:

After extensive research (I glanced through a Florida Almanac while kibitzing with some librarians I know) I have discovered a tragedy: Florida has no state color.

Sure, we have an official bird (mockingbird) and, yes, there's a song (Swanee River by Stephen Foster), but they reflect the rebel/redneck part of the state rather than the cool Caribbean-infused portion we call home.

We need a state color, and it needs to be orange. Orange says it all for Florida. Sure, the state flower is the orange blossom, but when's the last time you saw an orange blossom? They look white to me (all things in Florida are not what they appear to be).

Anyway, back to orange. I'm not just pimping the hue cuz I look fabulous and fierce in it -- y'know I do (see above) -- it's also fashionable for this fall/holiday season.

Everyone from Anna Sui (more pumpkin, really) and Angel Sanchez to Diana Von Furstenberg and Carmen Marc Valvo have groves of orange in their ready-to-wear collections for this season. David Rodriguez has "paprika," which is orange with an inferiority complex, and James Purcell has "sunset," which is an uppity orange. Nicole Miller uses orange to add warmth to her high-tech fabrics for fall, while Randolph Duke adopted "Tang orange" for his glam line, a favorite around Hollywood's red-carpet season.

And it's not only the pricey stuff. The Limited, The Gap, Mecca, Nike and Nautica all have the happy hue prominent in collections. Nautica calls it "safety orange" while Mecca goes for the more erudite "adobe orange."

Just be careful when you wear it in Northern Ireland.

Merrily they shopped and did good deeds

Downtown traffic was gridlocked Wednesday evening as some motorists tried to get home while many others headed for Kaufmann's, site of a huge event intended to raise funds for nonprofit organizations and needy families. "A Very Merry Evening" had food, fashion and entertainment on nine floors of the store, and nearly 4,800 people took it all in. The planners' goal was to raise $ 50,000, but they finished the night with more than $ 70,000, thanks in part to donations from about 20 vendors, including Nautica and Estee Lauder, and 48 local nonprofits that sold $ 10 tickets.

There was a Regis Philbin look-alike contest, a women's holiday fashion show, a Godiva chocolate sampling on the ninth floor and a "dressing your table for the holidays" presentation on the sixth floor.

And on the second floor, Claiborne Menswear design director Paul La Fontaine emceed a men's fashion show and talked about fashion and Claiborne 2.0, a lifestyle-driven urban sportswear line he recently developed and introduced.

Kaufmann's called the first-time event a huge success and said it will be presented again next year.

BODY:

On the day after Thanksgiving, the early birds get the bargains and the stores get the boost, three or four extra hours of selling time to inflate their sales figures and the free publicity that comes from the image of shoppers lined up outside at 5 a.m.. The early birds swear that predawn shopping is the way to go. They scour the ads on Wednesday and Thursday for the early specials, set the alarm for 4 a.m., and hit the stores in order of the respective opening times. Then they head back home with the bulk of their holiday shopping done before the rest of the family is awake.

But put a reminder note on those alarm clocks: No stores in Paramus open before 7 a.m. It doesn't matter what the ads say. If K-B Toys, Toys R Us, or Kohl's is in Paramus, the borough's blue law enforces the opening time.

Here are some of the early-bird openings for Friday. (Opening times are subject to last-minute marketing changes.). 5 a.m. K-B Toy stores in Elmwood Park, Englewood, Ramsey, Palisades Center mall, and everywhere else except Paramus.

6 a.m. All Toys R Us stores except Paramus. Kohl's stores in West Paterson and Secaucus. Nine stores at Woodbury Common including Donna Karan, all Polo stores, Nautica, Delia's, and Guess. American Eagle Outfitters at Palisades Center.

7 a.m. All other stores at Woodbury Common. Stern's and Value City at Bergen Mall. All J.C. Penney, Lord & Taylor, Macy's, and Sears stores. Target, Best Buy, and Filene's at Palisades Center. Target in Edgewater.

8 a.m. Nordstrom at Garden State Plaza. Most stores at Bergen Mall, Garden State Plaza, and Palisades Center.

9 a.m. All stores at Paramus Park and Riverside Square malls.

REVIEW-JOURNAL

For a gift that lingers, consider a gift of fragrance. It lingers after its wearer walks by. It can linger for years in memory, long after a relationship or era ends.

Just beware that the route to selecting the 'right' fragrance _ for oneself or another _ is fraught with peril.

The staff of Living learned that the hard way.

'The nose knows' may be a statement of common wisdom. But in fact, our collective 12 noses failed to reach a consensus on which commercially available perfumes smell best.

We held a 'sniff' test of 24 fragrances _ admittedly a small sample _ to identify the most popular for men and women, figuring our nostrils were just as qualified as those of the next consumer.

The result was bedlam. That will teach us; there is a reason to be scientific about these things.

In a smelly scenario reminiscent of Florida's presidential voting, we could not elect a clear winner from the products for either gender.

Votes spread across the spectrum, with a three-way tie for first place among the 12 women's fragrances: Cool Water Woman by Davidoff, Fendi by Fendi and Baby Doll by Yves St. Laurent.

Of the 12 men's fragrance samples, the No. 1 choice was XS Pour Homme by Paco Rabanne.

The only safe conclusion is scent is highly subjective, we decided.

Joe Bierman, vice president of retail marketing for Sephora stores, agreed in a telephone interview.

'Don't think your project fell apart,' Bierman said in a comforting voice, when the failed effort was explained. 'I think it (selecting a fragrance) is entirely subjective.'

Because of the subjective nature of whether a fragrance is pleasant, Bierman called it 'risky business' to buy a surprise holiday gift of fragrance for someone without knowing their preferred brand.

'At Christmas you see a lot of fulfillment of existing favorite brands,' according to Bierman, who then joked, 'You're sending it to your mother-in-law because it's expensive, this is her favorite, and this is her allotment for the year.'

No matter how good a scent smells when sprayed into air, its actual effect on skin will vary with each wearer. Body chemistry is the shorthand explanation.

Pressed for detail, Bierman said skin type is one factor. Fragrance will not last as long on a person with dry skin as it will on a person with oily skin.

Another factor is diet. 'What you eat, you emit to a greater or lesser extent,' he said. That is, the food a person eats affects the scent he or she naturally exudes. 'I'm not going to say it's malodorous, but it's going to mingle with the scent you're wearing,' Bierman said.

It's key for the potential wearer of a fragrance to give it a trial run. 'I can't wear Good Life,' a men's fragrance by Davidoff, one male Living staff member admitted. 'It makes me smell like Raid.'

Bierman and Natalie Elia, director of the Sephora store at Desert Passage, offered other tips for trying on fragrances.

The store, 3663 Las Vegas Blvd. South, is one of three Sephoras in Las Vegas. According to Bierman, the average Sephora stocks 300 fragrances for women and 200 for men.

Pulse points are the usual spots to apply fragrance. These include the side of the neck, the wrists and behind the knees. 'You have the most heat generated from your body at these spots,' Elia said. 'The heartbeat will make it come out.'

After applying a fragrance, let the alcohol content dissipate somewhat before judging the scent. Alcohol is present to spread the smell by carrying a perfume's scented oils into the air.

A fragrance is a complex structure that evolves over the time it is worn. Borrowing terminology from music, the initial scent of a perfume contains its top notes. Within 10 minutes or so, a perfume's middle notes begin to emerge. Several hours after applying the scent, its foundational bass notes are evident.

'That first burst you're smelling are indeed the top notes,' Bierman explained. 'The top notes are really important. They're the beacon. If a person doesn't like the top notes, they may not wait' for the later notes.

Because of the subtle changes, Bierman recommended a person wear a fragrance for several hours before deciding whether to purchase it.

Asked why judges in the Living section's test found it easier to verbalize why they didn't like a scent than to identify why they did like a scent, Bierman chuckled. The right fragrance is 'a very personal thing, a very emotional thing that is ephemeral,' he said. 'It touches a chord of mystery, more often of memory, that we do not have the ability to explain.'

Our sniff test involved 24 fragrances _ 12 for men and 12 for women. To select the samples, we worked with FragranceNet.com, a Massachusetts-based company that sells perfumes via the Internet. FragranceNet.com bills itself as 'the world's largest discount fragrance store,' and said it stocks 3,300 authentic fragrances, and no knockoffs.

Using FragranceNet.com's classification system, we selected two women's and two men's fragrances from each of the six basic perfume categories. The categories are: citrus, floral, Oriental, woody, spicy and mossy.

Our simple job was to smell each matched pair, and select which one we preferred. We also selected a 'best of show' each for women and men.

Prices vary widely among fragrances. Generally, any one fragrance may be available in varying intensities. Parfum, the most intense format, is the most expensive. It contains the most scent oils and will wear the longest.

Listed by declining intensity _ and price _ after parfum come: eau de parfum, eau de toilette and eau de cologne, after-shave. In men's fragrances, often eau de cologne is interchangeable with eau de toilette, according to both Sephora and FragranceNet.com.

A fragrance that contains natural oils will cost more than one with synthetic oils.

WOMEN'S CHALLENGERS

For what it's worth, here are some of our conflicting opinions for each pairing. Prices are from FragranceNet.com.

Women's citrus: Cool Water Woman by Davidoff (winner; $ 36.27 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. Allure by Chanel ($ 49 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Cool Water Woman 'smells like jelly beans. I like it,' wrote one female fan.

Another noted, 'These both seem very similar, crisp and clean, light and refreshing. Initially I picked Cool Water, but Allure seems a bit richer and deeper, with a more complicated structure.'

Women's floral: Giorgio by Giorgio (winner; $ 43.12 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. 242 Faubourg by Hermes ($ 52.50 for 1.6-ounce eau de toilette spray)

'Natural,' a supporter wrote of Giorgio.

'Smells like spicy Band-Aids. I hate this,' countered a Giorgio opponent.

Of 242 Faubourg, one judge wrote, 'too green, reminds me of getting hay fever.' Another called it an 'older-woman scent.'

Women's Oriental: Accenti by Gucci (winner; $ 35 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette) vs. Bijan by Bijan ($ 36.40 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Accenti received few strong endorsements, but Bijan for women got thumped.

The Gucci scent is 'a bit less powerful, a bit more mysterious,' wrote an Accenti defender.

One judge dismissed the entire Oriental category, which is often characterized by 'notes' such as vanilla, sandalwood, cedar, amber and musk. 'Both smell like a stuffy room that needs better ventilation,' she wrote.

Women's woody: Halston by Halston (winner; $ 31.13 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette) vs. Fendi by Fendi ($ 28.70 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette)

'Sophisticated,' wrote a Halston partisan. 'Crisp and tweedy, a good everyday, wear-to-work fragrance,' wrote another.

A foe of the Fendi for women called it 'shrill,' but Fendi had its defenders, too. 'Actually smells woody, (like) a walk in the forest,' one wrote approvingly.

A judge who just didn't like the category wrote, 'Both smell like restroom air freshener.'

Women's spicy: Baby Doll by Yves St. Laurent (tie; $ 64.17 for 3.4-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. Amarige by Givenchy (tie; $ 46.64 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray)

On the upside, Baby Doll came off as 'juicy' to one approving tester. But another tester likened its smell, negatively, to 'overripe fruit.'

Amarige is 'dark and smoky' to one fan. Another found it 'calming, delicious.'

'Too sweet,' wrote an Amarige detractor.

Women's mossy: Paloma Picasso by Paloma Picasso (winner; $ 46.50 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. CalAche by Hermes ($ 46.50 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Paloma is 'sexy,' according to one judge. Another discarded it as 'too masculine, smells like a forest.' Two judges guessed that the late middle and bass notes might be better than its top notes.

One fan called CalAche 'a boudoir scent, like a warm body just out of the bath.' Another wrote, 'If mossy can be nice, this is.'

Anti-CalAche partisans were equally adamant. 'A powder-puff old-lady smell,' wrote one. 'Horrible' and 'antiseptic smells' were also comments from critics.

MEN'S CHALLENGERS

Here's our take on fragrance pairs for men. Prices are from FragranceNet.com.

Men's citrus: 212 by Carolina Herrera (winner; $ 41.16 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette) vs. Cool Water by Davidoff ($ 27.44 for 1.4-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Herrera's 212 for men earned a 'very subtle, 'cool' smell' endorsement. 'Good citrus, not too much, but not too little,' was another endorsement.

Responses to the Cool Water for men ranged from 'really nice, fresh,' from a female judge, to, 'Perfumey. For guys who want girls who want 'girl guys,'" from a male judge.

Men's floral: Nautica by Nautica (winner; $ 30.23 for 1.7-ounce cologne spray) vs. Opium by Yves St. Laurent ($ 30.80 for 1.6-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Nautica for men is 'nice, calm, clean smelling, not overpowering,' according to one woman. 'Too feminine' was a minority criticism from judges of both genders.

Opium for men received various negative reports. 'Can smell incense,' wrote an incensed judge. 'Smells like oil paint,' wrote another. A woman wrote, 'even more floral (than Nautica). A guy would be brave' to wear it.

Men's Oriental: Escada by Escada (winner; $ 21 for 1.3-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. Lagerfeld by Lagerfeld ($ 31.62 for 2-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Escada for men seemed to win by default. It had no avid fans, but the Lagerfeld had even less support.

Men and women both had difficulty with the concept of an Oriental fragrance category for men. 'What is Oriental supposed to smell like? A little musky? Don't like it,' one wrote.

Men's woody: Santos de Cartier by Cartier (winner; $ 53.95 for 1.6-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. Polo by Ralph Lauren ($ 32.50 for 2-ounce eau de toilette spray)

Perhaps the strongest accolade for the Santos came from a woman: 'I'd sleep with a man wearing this,' she enthused.

Several judges pointed out the pine note in Santos, but declared it more subtle than Polo's pine. 'Strong enough to leave a vapor trail,' is how one tester disparaged the Polo.

Men's spicy: Paco Rabanne Pour Homme by Paco Rabanne (winner; $ 29.04 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. Bijan by Bijan ($ 37.35 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray)

'Smells rich' is how one woman explained her vote for Paco Rabanne.

The nay votes in this category were more descriptive. 'Holy cow. That's a spicy meatball,' is how one detractor justified his vote against Bijan for men. 'Too strong' was the verbatim verdict from two judges.

Men's mossy: XS Pour Homme by Paco Rabanne (winner; $ 32.56 for 1.7-ounce eau de toilette spray) vs. Fred Hayman 273 by Fred Hayman ($ 23.24 for 1.7 ounce cologne spray)

'Not so mossy, handsome,' was the most articulate statement on XS, which judges named best of show for men even though they couldn't talk much about it. 'Hard to put in words' was a judge comment that reflected the general sentiment. At least it attracted more attention than 273.

Gen-now

Rich's Junior and Young Men's Shop

Where: Inside Rich's, Mall of Georgia, Buford. 678-546-4300.

Hours: 10 a.m.-9 p.m. Mondays-Saturdays; noon-6 p.m. Sundays.

On the Web: www.gen-now.com.

It's a place, management hopes, where teenagers want to see and be seen. And to shop in.

The new Gen-now shop at the Mall of Georgia Rich's combines fashionable duds for teenage guys and girls (juniors) in one cool complex. Traditionally, these departments have been on different floors in retail stores, but Rich's decided to bring the genders together in adjacent shops. "We've created an environment for them," says Ed Tessaro, a Rich's regional vice president. "Here they can hang out with friends and have fun."

If this concept proves to be a moneymaker, Rich's plans to roll out the teen shops in select stores.

The look: The decor is hip and combines shopping with entertainment. A loft-inspired ceiling is exposed, and the floor is stained concrete. Large floor-to-ceiling graphics, a multizone sound system and theatrical lighting, which throws images and color onto the floor, give the space a rave-like atmosphere.

Nine highly visible plasma screens constantly show music videos. For a modern look, a chain "wall" divides the dressing rooms from the sales floor. And rather than being dubbed "dressing rooms," signs simply say, "try it on." Animal-print couches offer chic places to gab with friends or relax.

And to make shopping easier, the cashier terminals in this area are 25 percent to 50 percent faster. Also, a scanner lets a shopper scan a tag to check sale pricing on items. Be warned: Gen-now is directed at a younger customer. However, if you're older than 25 and can wear junior sizes, you won't be driven away.

The goods: Look for trendy, fashion-forward merchandise, along with designer names that any teen will recognize. For her: In jeans, labels include DKNY, Paris Blues, Mudd, L.E.I., Calvin Klein. Club wear and social occasion: XOXO, Byer Too! and Rampage. Lifestyle shops: Esprit, Tommy Hilfiger, Guess? Plenty of accessories are available as well. For him: Brands include Perry Ellis Jeans, Xtreme Gear, Ecko, Tommy Hilfiger Jeans, Polo Jeans Co., Guess?, Levis, Nautica and Girbaud.

Wired shoppers: Plenty of technology awaits e-savvy teens. A Gen-now Internet kiosk allows shoppers to browse the Web site, which features fashion trends, games and happenings in the city. Kids also can take part in surveys on topics of interest.

Welcome to the Planet: Inside Rich's, in the Gen-now shops, Planet Smoothie offers more than 30 varieties of made-to-order, frozen fruit drinks ($ 2.99-$ 5.99), Round-A-Bout wrap sandwiches including Southwestern Chicken, Turkey & Friends and Veggie Cha Cha ($ 2.99-$ 3.29) and Garden Lentil, Roasted Chicken Noodle and Spicy Vegetable soups ($ 2.99).

Just because you've never heard of men's wear designer John Varvatos doesn't mean you've never worn his clothes. The newest old name in the industry, Varvatos (pronounced like Barbados, but nowhere near as exotic) has spent most of the past two decades working for Calvin Klein or Ralph Lauren.

As head men's wear designer at each label, he not only played an integral role in both men's collections but was also responsible for launching the CK brand, Calvin Klein underwear, and Ralph Lauren's Polo Jeans Co. "The challenge at Calvin Klein was the blank canvas. There was no men's wear when I got there," explains the 45-year-old Varvatos in his modest New York City office. "At Ralph, I had more freedom, but in my last six months there, I thought, 'How far can I really take this without redoing the same thing?'"

In 1998, when Nautica approached the designer for the second time about creating his own line, he decided to go for it. "I'd become bored with what I was wearing, and I was having a hard time shopping," he says. "There was something missing. You had your classics, like Ralph Lauren, Armani, and Zegna, and then you had your fashion labels, like Gucci, Prada, and Dolce & Gabbana. I wanted to design for that guy in the middle." Varvatos is that guy: a mensch from Michigan who looks as if he'd be more comfortable doing your taxes than doing lunch.

His debut collection for fall 2000 updated men's wear staples (pea coats, shearlings, crew-neck sweaters) with softer silhouettes, luxurious fabrics, and handcrafted details. It was incredibly well received: He won the best new men's wear designer award at the American Fashion Awards this June--even Ralph sent a congratulatory note--and has attracted attention from influential buyers. Barneys, Bergdorf Goodman, Neiman Marcus, and Saks Fifth Avenue all have ceded valuable store real estate to promote the man they believe might reinvigorate the flagging men's wear category. "He's extremely talented and couldn't be a nicer guy," says Colby McWilliams, men's fashion director at Neiman Marcus. "The clothes are great products with a great value at a great price."

With his first store opening this month in New York City, Varvatos is keenly aware of the danger of spreading himself too thin. He says women's wear is a possibility in the future, but for now he's content educating men on how to dress fashionably without being fashiony. What does the designer think has gotten too much mileage? "Bad shoes. They can ruin any outfit. And it's time to put an end to the black suit and black T-shirt look." Certain classics refuse to be updated.

For Candle's, the time is now.

Candle's Inc., based in Valhalla, N.Y., recently debuted its new line of watches at the Accessories Market in New York. The collection -- manufactured by Reno, Nev.,-based Skagen Designs -- boasts 45 styles that are divided into two categories.

The Candle's Time Bracelet collection showcases designs in brushed steel and rhinestone-encrusted cases, while Candle's Time Trend features jelly-banded and novelty items -- that will evolve every season. Both collections also feature Japanese quartz movements, scratch-resistant crystals, and water resistance up to 100 feet.

"Watches are a must-have status symbol for our Gen Y customer," said Chairman and CEO Neil Cole. "Candle's Time will give our customer the trendy styles she desires at the price points she can afford."

Retailing for between $ 20 and $ 40, the collection will be sold in department and specialty stores beginning February 2001.

New Balance Stays on Track

New Balance Stays on Track New Balance Athletic Shoe Inc. is off and running again.

The Boston-based company recently renewed its annual sponsorship of the Armory Track & Field Center in New York, which houses one of the fastest-banked 200 meter tracks in the country and serves more than 60 high school track programs that use the center for practice from November to April.

Along with an undisclosed cash sponsorship, New Balance will provide shoes and apparel for the Armory's staff.

"Attracting a major footwear company like New Balance adds a lot of legitimacy to the facility and the events that we hold here," explained Lou Vasquez, the Armory's director of operations. "We can showcase elite athletes such as models for younger athletes."

Located at 168th Street and Fort Washington Avenue in Washington Heights, the 102nd Engineer's Armory has enjoyed an illustrious history as a safeguard for military equipment, a homeless shelter and a haven for track-and-field enthusiasts. "In the running world, the Armory is one of the best, if not the best, facility in the country and the indoor mecca for the Northeast," Vasquez said. "We're an integral part of the community and the athletic world."

Genesco and Timberland Double-Team Against Cold Feet

Genesco Inc. and The Timberland Co. warmed about 150 pairs of feet and many hearts when it recently took Genesco's 11-year-old Cold Feet, Warm Shoes program, which benefits the homeless, to Boston.

Held at the Pine Street Inn -- a resource for Boston's homeless community -- the Nashville-based company created a makeshift shoe store, complete with a seating area and stock room, where recipients received new or like-new shoes and professional, personalized fittings. Footwear was provided by Stratham, N.H.,-based Timberland, as well as Genesco's divisions, such as Johnston & Murphy, Dockers and Nautica Footwear.

"We want to empower these individuals with a choice and support these folks as they work to get back on their feet," explained Genesco Chairman and CEO Ben Harris. "In addition to providing a good pair of shoes, we aim to restore a little dignity by fitting them individually and treating them like a customer in our retail stores."

The Boston program marked the first time Genesco collaborated with another footwear company. According to Harris, Timberland was a natural fit because of the firm's "excellent social service programs."

Genesco's annual Nashville-based Cold Feet, Warm Shoes event will be held on Dec. 1.

Denim Cyber Guide

From veteran textile executives to industry newcomers to college students, hundreds of people each week log on to Olah Inc.'s Denim Survival Guide, located at olah.com, for a quick hit of denim trivia.

Olah, a New York-based sales and marketing firm that represents Asian and European denim manufacturers, celebrates this month the one-year anniversary of the Web site's relaunch.

When the online site was originally launched in 1996, and Olah was based in Toronto, the bare-bones Web site included sections on the history of denim, how jeans are made, how jeans achieve an indigo color, as well as a textile dictionary and a directory to jeans stores around the world. There is also an interview with Jenny Balfour-Paul, author of the British Museum Press book "Indigo."

"When the site was set up its mission was to simply educate people about denim," said president Andrew Olah, whose father founded the company more than 40 years ago. "But the long-term mission is to educate people about all cotton textiles."

The Web site was relaunched last December with the same content, but with sound and elaborate graphics.

Olah approached Robert Cameron, a former children's designer for Levi's who now heads up the New York-based new media firm Fantoscope, to redesign the Web site. According to Olah, the site averages between 2,000 to 2,500 hits each week, a figure he said has remained constant since the relaunch.

Although the Web site is targeted at textile professionals, Olah said it attracts cybersurfers from all walks of life. Earlier this year, Olah found a term paper about denim posted on a college student's personal Web site. The content, he claimed, appeared to have been copied word-for-word from his site.

Olah said content such as the denim shopping guide is of particular interest to nonindustry cybersurfers.

"When you go to a city that you are unfamiliar with and you want to go shopping in a great denim store, it's a problem finding one," he said. "But with our list of shops, we save you time, especially in a city like Tokyo."

There are no banner ads on the Web site, and Olah said he does not plan to seek out advertisers. He does plan on beefing up the olah.com's content, though, with articles about piece-dyed and yarn-dyed fabrics.

The Season of Getting

Nautica Jeans Co. is hoping to take the guesswork out of gift giving this holiday season -- and ensure that its products get their share of holiday dollars -- with an online interactive gift guide launched this month.

The guide, located at nauticajeans.com/giftguide, does not allow shoppers to place orders online. What it does is allow the user to create a Nautica Jeans "wish list," and have it sent to someone else as a not-so-subtle hint of holiday desires.

"This might be a great opportunity for us to provide a service to the consumer, give us more awareness to the consumer and then drive traffic into the stores," said Paulette McCready, president of Nautica Jeans division. "Because we don't sell on our Web site -- we are not an e-commerce site -- all we can do is show the product, some of which are our best holiday styles that would be located in probably all of the doors."

The guide features 12 core women's items, including sweaters, T-shirts, a denim jacket and four styles of denim jeans. On the opening Web page of the guide, there is a small thumbnail image of each item, a list of the available colors or washes and the suggested retail price.

The guide instructs visitors to select the desired merchandise, enter the desired gift-giver's e-mail address and a personal message. The system then sends a message to the desired giver directing her or him to a url that contains photos and prices of the desired items, as well as a zip code-based store locator. The url remains available for viewing for seven days.

McCready said the cyber wish list "prevents people from getting things they don't want."

McCready said the guide will probably be taken down after Christmas, but it may return for some other key gift-giving holidays -- minus the red and green graphics and Christmas tree images, of course.

"We talked internally about maybe seasonally doing it and using it for Mother's Day, Father's Day or Valentine's Day," she said. "Once the concept is there, it is easy to reposition the pictures or the products so that it is more appropriate for whatever season you're in."

Rowley: Red and Rusty

Forget stonewashed, destroyed or dirty, Cynthia Rowley has put her money on rusted.

The designer is launching a limited jeanswear collection for spring retailing built around two styles: One that's intended to look like the rivets have rusted and stained the fabric and another that features rouged legs.

In a phone interview, the designer said the two looks are intended to serve as an introduction for a fuller line to be released this fall.

"This season we just wanted to do some special things that would hopefully get people to notice," she said. "For fall, we will have a really great fit and more basic jeans with some special little hardware and things like that. We'll be introducing more basic but great-fitting jeans."

The jeans, which bear the Cynthia Rowley label and are being produced by Aris Industries, are due to ship in late February. They will retail for around $ 130 and be targeted at upscale specialty shops and boutiques, the designer said.

Rowley said she wanted to jump into the jeans game because of the dominance of denim in Americans' wardrobes.

"Now, everybody wears jeans for everything," she said. "You can put a little more design into jeans because they've become such a staple."

Bottoms Up

The year 2000 has, so far, been the year of jeans, at least according to Cotton Incorporated.

The Cary, N.C.-based promotional arm of the U.S. cotton growers last week reported that third-quarter sales of men's, women's and children's denim bottoms increased 6.3 percent from the same period last year.

For the three months ended Sept. 30, the women's denim bottoms market increased 5.6 percent.

Cotton Inc., using data gathered by the NPD Group, also reported that for the first nine months of the year, denim bottom sales grew by 5.1 percent over 1999. The women's market, in particular, grew 6.5 percent for the same nine-month time period.

On the retail front, Cotton Inc. reported that mass merchants accounted for 41.3 percent of jeans sales for the first nine months of 2000 -- compared with 40.1 percent for the same period last year.

Cotton Inc. also reported that during the first nine months of this year, national brands accounted for 50 percent of the women's jeans market.

BODY:

NEW YORK -- The department store fragrance business, spurred through the fall by a surge of product introductions, shifted into low gear last week. But retailers expect to emerge from December on the plus side.

Despite some reports that the fragrance business took a dip last week, top buyers say they are optimistic about the overall state of the business, adding that several new scents -- along with well-loved classics -- are already trending strong.

Federated Department Stores is expecting to end December with an increase "somewhere in the single digits," according to Rita Mangan, senior vice president of cosmetics at Federated Merchandising. She added that although last week "at first glance seemed disappointing," Federated's fragrance business actually exceeded expectations. The corporation had planned the first week of December slightly down because, historically, when Christmas moves into the fifth week of December, allowing two extra shopping days, consumers tend to procrastinate. Chanukah, which this year begins Dec. 22, also is falling later than usual.

"We had very strong sell-through on value sets," Mangan said, noting that gift-oriented fragrances and classics are dominating the top 10. They include Estee Lauder's Beautiful and Pleasures, Clinique's Happy, Lancome's Tresor, Ralph Lauren Romance, Calvin Klein's Eternity, Donna Karan's Cashmere Mist, Amarige from Givenchy and Tommy Hilfiger's Tommy Girl. The newly launched fragrances that held their own last week included Ralph from Ralph Lauren, J'adore from Christian Dior and, at Bloomingdale's, Michael Kors and Boucheron's Initial.

Mangan noted the new launches were expected to have a stronger representation in the top 10 than it has so far, but that's subject to change. The business seems to have reverted to its old traditional pattern of the new fall launches making way for the reemergence of the more giftable classic brands as Christmas approaches, she added. Mangan thought that the new introductions would have a larger share this year, because newness drove so much of the fall business. During the fall, the women's fragrance business chalked up gains in the high single digits, with men's trailing slightly behind that lofty level. "Overall, the fragrance portion of the business is the strongest part of the business," Mangan said.

The most successful women's launches at Federated this fall have been Truth Calvin Klein; Ralph; J'adore, which was launched in the spring but retains its strength; Lucky You; Noa from Cacharel; Shi by Alfred Sung; Michael Kors, and Boucheron's Initial.

On the men's side, the hot introductions are Nautica's Latitude Longitude, the male version of Lucky You, Dunhill's Desire, Donna Karan's DKNY and Hugo Boss.

Due to the expected shift in business toward Christmas, Federated decided to concentrate its advertising into the crunch. Ads originally scheduled for November were moved into December, and those slotted for early December were moved to a later spot.

"Our challenge is to ensure that we are servicing each and every customer," she said, adding that demands have increased. "Customers come to the counter wanting to know what's new, what's the best-selling gift-giving brand."

Mangan also sees the week after Christmas continuing to grow in importance, particularly for new cosmetics launches endeavoring to get a jump on the spring season.

"In our doors, we've been seeing strong business from strong, unique fragrances," said Deborah Walters, senior vice president and general merchandise manager for fragrances and cosmetics for Saks Fifth Avenue. "Our customers are going wild over Oh My Dog, Michael Kors and Bulgari Blu, as well as Initial, Jo Malone's whole collection, J'adore, Sisley's Eau de Soir and Quelques Fleurs. On the men's side, Cartier's Must Pour Homme is doing very well."

Newly repackaged scents and scents with new ancillaries are also doing strong business at Saks, Walters said. "Guerlain repackaged Vetiver, and it's beautiful -- and selling well," she said. "Hermes's 24, Faubourg's boxes are beautiful, unique and festive, and also doing very well. And Lancome's Climat has had some new items added to the line this year, and we're seeing a nice pop in that business."

The "luxury classics" are also doing well. "Chanel No. 5 continues to show a great trend, and we're doing well with the new No. 5 to Go set," Walters said. "We do a wonderful business with Lalique and its limited-edition pieces. Both the men's and women's Angel scents are doing very well; the glittering body powder and perfume extract crystal star have been driving the women's business, and the rubber flask for men has been a lot of fun. Also, we're seeing a nice turn in the whole Annick Goutal collection, and L'Eau d'Issey for men is selling well.

"I'm feeling optimistic for this season, based on recent trends in business," said Walters. "There are a lot of good things happening in the fragrance mix, and I think it's going to be a good holiday season."

"I'm confident that our fragrance business will finish higher than last year's, but all the same, this is a disappointment, considering the double-digit trend we were experiencing prior to the fourth quarter," said Gail Gordon, vice president of cosmetics for Macy's East. "But we are quite sure that this 'nail-biting' period up until the last week -- including the benefit of the extra day -- will result in a good fragrance season."

According to Gordon, Pleasures, Beautiful, Tresor and Happy are now enjoying increases. "At the fragrance bar, top brands are Cashmere Mist, Romance, Tommy Girl, Chanel No. 5, Allure, White Diamonds, Eternity and Amarige. These are the classic brands that continue to lead the pack."

And according to Gordon, Ralph and Truth have "far exceeded planned expectations, even through the last few weeks. They are doing stellar business."

At the men's bar, Acqua di Gio is at the top of the list. "Acqua di Gio by far ranks as the consistent top brand," she said. "It is enjoying double-digit increases. Polo Sport, Eternity, Jean Paul Gaultier's Le Male, Tommy, Calvin Klein's Obsession, Romance, Givenchy's Pi, Curve and Davidoff Cool Water are also all top-ranking brands. In addition, we are delighted with Latitude Longitude's results. It now ranks in the top 10 and is exceeding plan."

At Belk's, senior vice president and general merchandise manager Jonathan Pollock said that several new fragrances have been "amazing" right out of the gate.

"We put Origins Ginger Essence on counter in November, and it's been explosive," he said. "If you look at Ginger Essence in just the doors that it's in, it's ranking in my top three. Customers liked the fragrance in the Origins body products, and they find the scent very easy to wear."

In fact, he said, the Origins brand itself has been doing very well in Belk's doors. "Comp store sales for the brand for November-early December are up 30 percent over last year," he said. "We expect that to continue for the holidays."

Pollock is also pleased with Ralph's performance so far. "It's been spectacular -- it has been consistently ranking in our top five," he said. "It's obviously targeted at a younger customer than Ralph Lauren's traditional business, but we haven't seen a cap on the age group buying it." The Ralph Lauren Romance masterbrand business is "very powerful, and that seems to be accelerating as we go toward the holidays."

Others selling well at Belk's are Truth Calvin Klein -- "It is trending in Belk's top 10," Pollock said -- Cacharel's Noa, Lancome's Tresor, Beautiful and Donna Karan's Cashmere Mist.

Existing fragrances vary in their performances at Belk's. "It's a mixed bag for the existing scents," said Pollock. "Some are doing well, and some are suffering. But the ones that are suffering seem to be doing so because of weaknesses in their programs, not the fact that they're not new."

One of the strongest classics for Belk's is Chanel No. 5, Pollock said. "It's the pinnacle of our holiday business, year after year," he said. "The year we have a bad Chanel year, we'd better get out of the fragrance business altogether."

On the men's side, Pollock said, Acqua de Gio's business growth is "phenomenal," and Nautica's Latitude Longitude is "doing very, very well."

Pollock said that gift sets and Belk's Wrap-It-Up container-driven business -- where Belk's assembles sets and includes additional samples and promotional items -- are "driving a lot of retail. Customers want things that are completely done, wrapped and ready to go. So many companies -- Lauder, Calvin Klein, Givenchy, Ralph Lauren, and more -- are doing a great job with these sets."

According to Jim Christie, divisional merchandise manager for Dillard's Phoenix division, newness is selling in his doors. "I adore is doing phenomenally well, as are Ginger Essence and Ralph by Ralph Lauren," he said. "There's a lot of newness -- it's what the customer is looking for. There's always going to be some cannibalization of fragrances, though. It's not all plus business, unfortunately."

But there is definitely brand loyalty among Dillard's clients. Happy, the Romance masterbrand and Pleasures and Beautiful are doing great business, said Christie, as are Guerlain's Shalimar and the overall Chanel, Tommy Hilfiger, Calvin Klein and Ralph Lauren fragrance portfolios.

"The fragrance category is doing extremely well for us, and we expect that to continue," said Christie.

Liz Haesler, vice president of cosmetics for Dayton Hudson/Marshall Field's, is seeing strong growth from what she terms "trend-oriented fragrances."

"We have a very sophisticated fragrance guest, and that's reflected in our top-sellers list," Haesler said. "Ginger Essence, which we have positioned both in our Origins store-in-stores and in our fragrance bar, is doing extremely well -- we're expecting our Origins business to end up 25 percent over last year's. Michael Kors, which is one of my all-time favorite fragrances, is doing extremely well for us. But probably the biggest success story for us, of the new launches, is Ralph. That is just blowing out of the store." Haesler is also seeing continued strength from classic fragrances. "We can always count on certain classics for great business," she said. "Chanel does well year after year, and Angel is a huge business for us. Cashmere Mist is seeing double-digit growth. Issey Miyake also continues to do well for us and is seeing double-digit growth, also. And Pleasures is continually big."

Haesler's three biggest men's fragrance brands are Acqua di Gio, Issey Miyake and Jean Paul Gaultier. "Acqua di Gio continues to explode out of the stores," she said. "The amount of business that scent does is truly mind-boggling."

But while newness does drive business, Haesler isn't completely sold on it. "It's hard, because in order to bring in, say, nine new brands, you need to displace nine others," she said. "For next year, we're going to focus on a smaller number and not carry every single new thing. That way, we can show our passion for the fragrances that we do choose to carry."

While gift sets are tracking "about flat" to last year's business in Haesler's doors, she's doing well with a selected few. "One of our most unique sets is one from Lauder, with three scent pens -- White Linen, Pleasures and Beautiful -- packaged together. It's an innovative way to sell classic fragrances, and it's already doing well for us. We've sold 15,000 units so far, and we'll definitely sell out of it. Also, Tresor has a gift set that combines with color that is selling very, very well, and there's a Ralph set that is very strong. And we've had 100 percent sell-through on our Ginger Essence gift set." Nordstrom's fragrance business has also been strong thus far, said Amy Jones, a spokesperson for the chain. "Overall, we have been pleased with the fragrance business for the season," she said. "Perfume tends to be stronger around this time of year as a gift item. That doesn't mean that it doesn't sell at other times, but this definitely gives it a push."

Among Nordstrom's top sellers this season, she said, are Herve Leger perfume, Faconnable's men's and women's eau de toilettes, Initial's 1-oz. perfume and 3.4 oz. eau de parfum and Thierry Mugler's Angel. "Angel tends to be a perennial favorite with our customers," she said.

While they're buying fragrance, Jones added, they're also picking up several color items, including a MAC palette exclusive to Nordstrom that retails for $ 38.50, a shimmer chalk set from Bobbi Brown and sparkle formulas from Tony & Tina. "The holiday season seems to be perfect for sparkle," she said.

At Jacobson Stores Inc. in Jackson, Mich., the cosmetics and treatment business continues to rocket along with another 20 percent increase for the first week of December, but the fragrance business flattened out last week, with women's holding even and men's down about 8 percent.

Laurence Williams, divisional merchandise manager at Jacobson's, says he suspects that, thanks to the extra shopping days, the business will develop later than usual. He said he expects the last 10 days of the holiday selling season to be more important than ever.

However, he said he remains confident that the business will come out ahead for December. Jacobson's is projecting a 12 percent gain for the entire beauty division, including color and treatment. Women's fragrance is forecasted at 8 percent ahead, with men's holding even.

Williams said that one reason for the lack of zest in the men's figures is that the specialty store's top scent, Irish Tweed, is buried in the women's fragrance numbers because it is part of the highly successful Creed brand. The top-selling brand at Jacobson's is Thierry Mugler.

One reason for Laurence's optimism is that much of the strength of the fragrance business is in the cosmetics department with brands such as those of the Estee Lauder group, Chanel and Guerlain, all of which "are running strongly." In addition, Jacobson's top-ranked brands -- such as Mugler, Creed, Boucheron and Donna Karan -- had a brisk week.

Belk's Pollock seemed to sum up the mood of the retail industry with a cautiously optimistic comment. "It's early to make definitive predictions about how this holiday will end up," he said.

"I'm not in a position yet to say anyone's failed, but there are some brands doing better than others. We feel very good about the season, and we're looking for a very strong finish."

The weather may be frightful, but dressing for can be delightfully cozy.

For casual wear, parkas and car coats in microfibre or faux fur fabrics keep out the cold.

Layering with sweaters and vests makes dressing versatile in our unpredictable climate.

Look for details, such as inner cuffs on parkas, inside pockets and detachable hoods, to get the most from your winter casuals.

Faux fur and wool blends lend elegance to dressier outerwear, but the real secret to style is in the accessories.

Luxurious leather gloves, soft cashmere scarves and saucy hats add colour and comfort to a classic look.

HEADLINE: Unilever Cosmetics International Announces New Board-Level Executive Structure to Support Its Rapid Expansion

DATELINE: Dec. 14, 2000

BODY:

Unilever Cosmetics International (UCI) gears up to support its rapidly expanding portfolio of global brands with the announcement of the board. UCI, which has grown quickly in recent months, now includes Calvin Klein Cosmetics, the Unilever Prestige brands, which include Nautica, Vera Wang, BCBG Max Azria, and European Designer Fragrances which manage the fragrance collections of Lagerfeld, Chloe, Cerruti and Valentino.

Paulanne Mancuso, President and CEO of Unilever Cosmetics International said, "This executive structure has been designed to respond to the business environment and support our newly expanded portfolio. These key functions will substantially fortify the existing businesses and position the company to build powerful new global franchises."

The structure, which is effective January 2, 2001, has three units: Business Units which are responsible for sales and profit across all brands in their respective markets; Global Marketing Units which are responsible for product development and marketing for their specific brands; and Corporate Units which manage support functions across the entire organization.

Business Units:

Peter Midwood, formerly CEO of Elizabeth Arden, has been named President of Business Units and Chief Operating Officer of UCI. In this post, Midwood will be responsible for sales and profit across all UCI markets worldwide and will report directly to Paulanne Mancuso.

Reporting into Midwood are the following board members:

Jim Bunn has been named Senior Vice President, Calvin Klein Cosmetics, North America. In this role based in N.Y.C., Bunn will oversee the U.S. business for the Calvin Klein fragrance and color brands and the UCI Canadian affiliate.

Mark Scott has been named Senior Vice President, Unilever Prestige, North America. In this role, Scott will oversee the Unilever Prestige and European Designer Fragrance brands in the U.S. market. He will also be responsible for the military business.

Jean Mortier, formerly Chief Financial Officer, UCI, has been named Senior Vice President, Europe. In this role, Mortier will oversee Calvin Klein Cosmetics, Unilever Prestige and the European Designer Fragrance brands throughout Europe.

Global Marketing Units - each of the following unit heads will report directly to Paulanne Mancuso: Hilary Dart has been named President of Calvin Klein Cosmetics. In this role based in N.Y.C., Dart is responsible for the global marketing strategies and product development for all Calvin Klein fragrance brands and color cosmetics.

Laura Lee Miller remains President of Unilever Prestige. In this role based in N.Y.C., Miller is responsible for the global marketing strategies and product development supporting the Nautica, Vera Wang and BCBG Max Azria properties.

Gabriele Pungerscheg, formerly Senior Vice President, has been named President of European Designer Fragrances. In this role based in Paris, Pungerscheg provides product development and global marketing strategies for the designer fragrance houses of Lagerfeld, Chloe, Valentino and Cerruti.

Corporate Units - each of the following unit heads will report directly to Paulanne Mancuso: Mike Indursky remains Senior Vice President of Strategic Planning and Marketing. In this role, Indursky will oversee the development of global business strategies, advertising, PR and market research.

Bob Olsen remains Senior Vice President of Operations/Supply Chain. In this role, Olsen is responsible for global production, logistics, new package development and materials management.

Sunil Mehta has been named Chief Financial Officer. Mehta will oversee global finance, information systems and administrative services. Mehta joins UCI from Elizabeth Arden where he was Chief Financial Officer.

Charlene Binder has been named Senior Vice President of Human Resources. In this role, Binder is responsible for global human resource policies and administration. Effective February 5, 2001, Binder joins UCI from HPC where she was Director of Human Resources for Supply Chain.

In addition, supporting UCI within Unilever United States is Maria Chiclana who remains Senior Vice President Law. In this role, Chiclana has global responsibility for legal, regulatory, trademarks, consumer and public affairs and corporate intelligence.

Unilever Cosmetics International is the New York based manufacturer of cosmetics and fragrances for Calvin Klein Cosmetics; fragrances for the Unilever Prestige brands which include Nautica, Vera Wang and BCBG Max Azria and fragrances for the European Designer Fragrance brands which include Cerruti, Chloe, Lagerfeld and Valentino.

HEADLINE: Genesco pulls rebound targeting youth, urban markets

BODY:

After a solid year building its two new youth-oriented brands, footwear retailer Genesco plans to keep focusing its resources in that market, says Ben Harris, chairman and chief executive officer.

"Our stock price has increased, and we've had consistent quarterly earnings this year," Harris says. "We've had a good string of beating the analysts' expectations, which probably has something to do with that."

Key to the company's success has been its ongoing strategy of selling off its manufacturing facilities and devoting itself to the retail market. When Harris started with the company 33 years ago, it had 28 footwear factories. It now has one, here in Nashville, manufacturing the company's line of Johnson & Murphy dress shoes.

"Most of your footwear manufacturing has moved offshore," Harris says. "It's mostly economics. We felt that our focus should be on our retail outlets."

It was that exit from manufacturing that helped the company turn around its stock from a 1994 low of $1.62 to its current trading level in the low $20s, a 28-year high.

In the third quarter ended Oct. 31, the company reported $8.8 million in earnings, while net sales - $175.6 million - were up 26 percent from last year.

"Basically you had a company that was part manufacturer, part retailer, and the manufacturing began to take a back seat as they moved more toward marketing and retailing," says Gary Dennis, an investment banker with Robert W. Baird & Co., Atlanta, who covered Genesco as a retail analyst for several years with J.C. Bradford & Co.

"They went through and decided which retailing concepts they wanted to run with, and which ones they wanted to exit. They got out of making boots and into the urban retailing market."

It's a strategy that might not work for every multifaceted operation, but has done well for Genesco, he says.

"There aren't a lot of shoe companies that were in the same situation as Genesco. Most retailers just don't have that kind of manufacturing base - it's rare to see a vertically integrated company like that," Dennis says, adding that given the manufacturing losses, "it made sense for them to get out when they did, and they've done well since."

Genesco's retail outlets include Johnson & Murphy and Jarman, as well as Journeys and Underground Station. Journeys has been wildly successful for the company, and Underground Station is starting to pick up. The two are aimed at different segments of the youth market, with Journeys going after the teen dollar - the "skateboard, surfer" customer, according to Harris - while Underground Station is focused on the more urban, cross-cultural customer. Although the stores carry some of the same brands, much time and effort has gone into making the concepts different, he says.

Even though the Journeys concept had been around since 1987, it had never been fully capitalized on, Harris says. With the renewed focus on retail, the youth market was identified as a potential growth sector. By the end of this fiscal year in January, that division will have posted growth of 43 percent, he says. Plans are to open between 80 and 100 more Journeys stores next year.

"It continues to be the fastest growing part of our business," he says. "We had launched it in California during the 1980s, but it was not managed very well. They had tried to be all leading-edge fashion, then more of the private labels. It was a combination of errors that we have corrected."

As for Underground Station, the concept was developed inhouse and then introduced through the Jarman chain, some stores in which are being converted to Underground Stations.

"We've been operating Jarman stores in urban centers for quite some time, so we understood the customer," says Harris.

One sign of the company's success is its improved bargaining position for real estate. Genesco's new-store openings are now about 75 percent backfill, or in areas where it already had a presence. Due to its store successes, it is able to get better locations, including some in smaller markets, Harris says. The opportunity also is present now to expand out of its main markets in the South and Southwest.

"Most of our new markets will be along the East Coast, which was the last place we were going due to the economics of the markets in terms of labor costs and higher build-out costs."

New markets are also being explored as the chain launches Journeys Kidz, aimed at the 5- to 12-year-old demographic. The store will open four of the stores early next year, two in Nashville in the CoolSprings Galleria and Hickory Hollow malls.

In addition, Genesco will maintain its branding agreements with Dockers and Nautica, high-profile names which have paid off well for the company.

"There aren't many men out there who don't have a pair of Dockers slacks of some type," he says. "Our having the footwear to complement the clothing is an asset."

SAN MARCOS - It's almost not like the holidays at Prime Outlets Center.

At one of the biggest outlet centers in Texas - 125 stores in 526,000 square feet of retail space - decorations are sparse. The only Santa employed by the center is a guy who strolls around on Saturdays and hands out candy canes.

Forget getting the kids' pictures taken with him.

The most obvious clues that this is a mid-December weekend are shoppers clogging the brick sidewalks and cars parked illegally in overflowing parking lots.

Is this seemingly slack display of holiday spirit any way to sell stuff during the biggest retail season of the year? It's actually a strategy.

"People don't come here to hang out. They come here to buy. They don't want distractions. They are focused. And they're not going to stand in line for a photo," said Kathy Berry, a vice president of marketing for Prime Retail, the parent company to the Prime Outlets Center in San Marcos.

Drawing crowds away from retail malls is a year-round essential for most outlet centers, and the competition is especially fierce in November and December.

Outlet centers survive by offering low prices year-round, but during the holiday season the cuts go much deeper. That really helps haul in the shoppers - who evidently don't care if there's a holiday puppet show every day.

Roger and Debbie Shelton opened the trunk of their white Lexus to cram more bags into what little space was left. "We make a day of it when we come," Mr. Shelton said.

The two arrived in San Marcos at 10 a.m., after driving two and a half hours from Houston.

"We like getting a good deal, instead of going to Foley's or Dillard's," Mr. Shelton said. Luring them are the higher-tone shops at the San Marcos outlets: the Coach Factory Store, Cole Haan and Waterford/Wedgwood.

The Sheltons are among the core of "determined" shoppers that outlet centers depend on, notably during the holidays.

San Marcos' off-price acres - principally Prime Outlets and the next-door Tanger Outlet Center - have become so well known that they now rank among the top five tourist attractions in the state.

More than half the shoppers are from outside the San Antonio-Austin corridor, where San Marcos is centered.

Year-round, the typical shopper spends about $ 200 during each visit to the Prime Outlets center, company officials said. That figure almost doubles during the holiday season.

Roughly 25 percent of the Prime Outlets' shoppers are from Mexico, and they spend far more than average, according to the center's estimates.

At 6 a.m. last Friday, Carlos V. Santibaez and his nephew left Mexico City and reached San Antonio 12 hours later. "And with only one bathroom stop," he said.

Early Saturday he made the short trip to San Marcos. He expects to drop $ 1,500 in one day on gifts at the San Marcos outlet centers.

He'll spend the holidays with relatives and friends in San Antonio, where he'll do some shopping at the big malls but without giving his wallet such a workout.

Planning strategy

Near the Sony store, Ron and Cynthia Havelka sat on a bench in a grassy area, studying a map of the outlet center. Their two sons, aged 9 and 12, have scattered to the shops. They'll spend the weekend in San Marcos.

They live about 75 minutes away in Bandera, and Mr. Havelka agreed to the trip when his wife made an offer: They'd stay the night at a hotel, and he could spend lots of time at the nearby Bennigan's, watching sports on TV at the bar. "It worked," she said.

The shopping tab will be around $ 400, they figured. That amount would have been bigger, but they're saving for a down payment on a home.

The two aren't giving each other gifts this year, so the money will go for the sons' presents and maybe some things for home. Relatives are likely to get gifts bought at Target, Mr. Havelka said.

The competition

Executives at many outlet malls have no qualms about taking shots at the big department stores that anchor regional malls.

Among them is Nancy Braun, general manager of the Tanger Outlet Center in San Marcos, which has 75 stores and is expanding.

"At Dillard's, you get a small sampling of merchandise from different manufacturers," she said. "Here, instead of a few racks of Tommy Hilfiger, you have a 12,000-square-foot store."

Foley's, for one, doesn't appreciate such remarks.

"We've been around for so long. The store was founded in 1900. We've had a lot of time to build up its reputation and merchandise. And along with that, I'd say that we're well known for customer service. We are superior in that," said company spokeswoman Priscilla Thorne. Foley's offers "one-stop shopping, and that is probably our biggest edge."

At the Prime Outlets Center, sales during the post-Thanksgiving weekend were up 11 percent from last year, according to its survey of 47 stores.

A new outlet center in the Dallas area, Allen Premium Outlets, can't measure any holiday increase because it opened only three months ago. About 40 stores are open now.

No sniping about regional malls comes from the Allen center, which is closer to a bunch of regional malls than many of its counterparts.

The center's stores include Nautica, Timberland, Liz Claiborne, Perry Ellis, Tommy Hilfiger and Banana Republic Factory Store.

"We don't see ourselves as working against" the regional malls. "We respect them," said Michele Rothstein, spokeswoman for the Allen center's parent company, Chelsea GCA Realty. The manufacturers and designer-name retailers "utilize the outlets to sell overstocks, excess inventory and previous season's merchandise," she said.

The malls, meanwhile, can be a bit snooty when it comes to outlet centers as holiday competitors.

"Our shoppers want the best selection, and they want the most current merchandise. That's who we draw," said Wally Brewster, vice president of General Growth Properties.

The Chicago company owns or manages 137 malls, including Stonebriar Centre in Frisco, Vista Ridge Mall in Lewisville, Town East Mall in Mesquite and The Parks at Arlington.

"Our customer isn't going shopping just based on price." And anyway, mall stores are offering a slew of price cuts this season, he said.

Mr. Brewster says he's not concerned about outlet centers. "We don't consider them much competition."

This year's shoppers can choose from sensual spicy or floral fragrances

BODY:

Of all the seasonal gift-giving traditions, one of the most intimate is the gift of fragrance. More perfume is sold in the month of December -- about a third of the total sales for the entire year, according to the NPD Beauty Trends group -- than any other time of year, even Valentine's Day. And yet those who give fragrance to their mothers, sisters, gal pals and significant others can walk into a real trap, because fragrance is as personal to a woman as her brassiere size.

Men who buy these gifts for women fall into three categories: the Easily Led, who know nothing and rely on the salesperson for advice; the Mother's Memory Male, who will give every woman on his list the perfume he remembers his mother wore (Joy, Chanel No. 5, Arpege, fill in the blank); and the Scent-Smart Guy, who will actually ask the women in his life what they would like (a rare bird, he; hold on to him!).

This holiday season, fragrance givers are going to get an olfactory assault at the perfume counter. After years of faux fragrance -- the "lites," the voiles, the watered-down unisex musk and citrus (bye-bye ck1, we won't miss you) -- scent has followed its fashionable cousins in this age of go-go companies and economic upturn. Effusion and obviousness are back in.

Fragrance as well as clothing has become more obviously opulent and showoff-y. Color has returned to fashion. So has decoration. Sequins and spangles on cocktail dresses and even trousers equate to perfumes that have their own kind of excessive fizz and sparkle. And that equates to effusive florals and spicy orientals, the best of which come from fashion and jewelry houses such as Cartier, Burberry, Gucci, Calvin Klein and Vivienne Westwood.

For a while there, perfume lost its ability to finish a woman's careful preparation to face the day or the evening. Because she was treading on unsteady ground at work, the young woman feared that she would be telegraphing the wrong idea if her scents were considered provocative. So she shared her boyfriend or brother's citrus after-shave, which a canny Calvin Klein jumped on to create the feather-light ck1, which was sold even in Tower Records stores.

Now that what constitutes sexual harassment in the workplace has been codified, women are starting to get back to their sensual, sexy perfumes with no fear of being misunderstood. Opium, the salaciously gorgeous scent from Yves Saint Laurent, is getting a second launch with accompanying ads featuring a provocative photograph of a quite naked Sophia Dahl; L'Air du Temps, Nina Ricci's spicy, effusive floral, has been repackaged in a millennium bottle emphasizing the grace and airiness of its original Lalique doves; and Bulgari, the jewelry house whose perfumes, thus far, have been infused with a calming base of black or green teas, has created the spiciest, sexiest new oriental of them all, Bulgari BLV (Blue).

While there are those few women and men who are allergic to perfume and other forms of scent, the NPD Beauty Trends group found in a recent survey that 82 percent of men say "they like women to wear fragrance," says NPD spokeswoman Keishi Fulton, "and 81 percent of women we surveyed said they liked their men to wear it."

So take heed. Perfume in its various strengths and forms is still one of those special Christmas gifts that can be a sensual experience for both giver and receiver. Trust your nose and your heart.

Susan Lisovicz has the details.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SUSAN LISOVICZ, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): American designer Donna Karan rules the catwalk, where she is admired for her cool, classic, comfortable fashions. But she has never been a good fit on Wall Street.

Since her much-publicized IPO in 1996, Donna Karan stock has lost more than two-thirds of its value. Now that's presented a buying opportunity for a man whose upscale acquisitions include Dom Perignon champagne, Givenchy apparel and Tag Heuer watches.

BERNARD ARNAULT, CHAIRMAN & CEO, LVMH: For us, it's clear in our strategy to expand in the U.S., where we were not as strong as we are in Europe or in the Far East.

LISOVICZ: Bernard Arnault's LVMH has an agreement to buy Gabrielle Studio, owned by Donna Karan and her husband, which owns the licenses to Donna Karan products. The rich fees the couple receives have been a sore point with investors, who say it's one reason why the stock has been losing value. The separate offer to buy the Donna Karan company has to be approved by the company's board of directors.

WALTER LOEB, LOEB RETAIL LETTER: Gabrielle Studio and Donna Karan skim from the top. Basically, they take, for every sale Donna Karan gets her share of her profits, not from the bottom line. Gabrielle Studio being owned by LVMH no longer can do this, and the Donna Karan company can be profitable to a much greater extent than it ever has been before.

LISOVICZ: Women's Wear Daily editor Ed Nardoza talked to Donna Karan after the offer was made and says the designer believes she is misunderstood on Wall Street.

ED NARDOZA, EDITOR-IN-CHIEF, WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY: The fashion business is a creative, emotional business, and what Donna stressed with us is that it doesn't really operate on a quarterly basis.

There weren't a lot of designer companies that went public when she went public. In fact, she -- of the Americans, she was the first, and there's a learning curve there.

LISOVICZ (on camera): It hasn't been as difficult for some of Donna Karan's competitors even in this challenging market environment. Nautica's stock is up 30 percent year to date, and Ralph Lauren is up 25 percent.

Susan Lisovicz, CNN Financial News, New York.

OUTLET TOWNS GREAT FOR SHOPPERS

BYLINE: By Suzanne C. Ryan, GLOBE STAFF

BODY:

KITTERY, Maine - Imagine a holiday shopping excursion where parking spaces are available, sales clerks are idle and friendly, and 50-percent-off sales are the norm. Would you call that a winter wonderland?

Actually, you can find all of that here in Kittery and Freeport - Maine's outlet capitals.

Indeed, there is no blaring holiday music, no gaudy garland, no Santa Claus. Just discounted gift possibilities at more than 200 stores.

Is the shopping worth the long drive? (From Boston, it's about 75 minutes to Kittery and about two and a half hours to Freeport). The sacrifice depends on your holiday gift list, of course. But consider: Finding parking at a packed suburban mall could take 30 minutes.

In Freeport, there are $99 Coach pocketbooks and $20 Brooks Brothers men's sweaters. Kittery has Children's Place leather jackets for $5.99 and one-ounce Perry Ellis cologne for $18. Other stores have items such as compact discs, jewelry, and jeans.

To be sure, the prices at some outlets are only slightly lower than Boston area stores. Jones New York in Freeport, for example, is offering some of the same sweaters seen at Filene's in Boston for only about $20 less. Music 4 Less in Kittery wants $15.99 for the Britney Spears CD "Oops! I Did It Again," hardly a bargain.

Other outlets, such as the Coach Factory Store in Freeport, are offering significantly discounted goods but some of the designs are several years old. That's unacceptable for some fashion hounds.

And while the Brooks Brothers Factory Store clearance center in Freeport has marked everything down 50 percent, many of the sizes are either very small or very large.

Aside from these downsides, however, one must remember that any shopping spree is a hunt and a trip to Maine is certainly more pleasant than any trip to a suburban mall in December.

Driving north on I-95, visitors should begin their trip at a rustic lodge which houses the Maine Tourism Association just past Exit 3. There one can unwind (inhaling crisp air and observing the beauty of the surrounding white pine trees) before grabbing free maps detailing Freeport's almost 100 stores and Kittery's 120 stores.

While both towns offer some of the same brands (Calvin Klein, Brooks Brothers, GAP, Jones New York, Polo Ralph Lauren), Kittery and Freeport offer very different shopping experiences for the stroller.

Kittery has a strip mall format, where shoppers drive from mini-mall to mini-mall on either side of Route 1.

While a visitor could walk the entire one-mile stretch of shops, there is no sidewalk set up for this purpose and the brisk Maine air also deters. So the day consists of jumping in and out of one's car, a strain for anyone with children.

Kittery's offerings include women's apparel brands such as Anne Klein and Dana Buchman and men's clothing options such as Casual Male Big & Tall and Nautica. Children's stores include Carter's Childrenswear and OshKosh B-Gosh. For accessories, there is Cole-Haan shoes, Sunglass Hut, and Zales Outlet.

Freeport, which has the distinction of being home to L.L. Bean, has more of a village feel to it. Most of the shops are located on or near Main Street. Visitors can park in one of many free parking lots situated around town and then walk from store to store.

The fashion options include Abercrombie & Fitch, Banana Republic Factory Store and Burberry. Accessory stores include a Nine West Outlet, a Coach Factory Store, and a Dooney & Bourke Factory Outlet. Freeport also boasts lots of specialized stores such as Birdwatcher and Gardener, Freeport Knife Co., and 20th Maine, a Civil War shop.

Shopping both towns in one day is an aggressive strategy. But if you leave early and stay late, you just might check off everything on your gift list. If you go KITTERY Directions: Take I-95 north to Exit 3 (Kittery/Coastal Route 1 North). Lunch: Two prominent restaurants on the strip are Burger King and McDonald's. But the Weathervane Seafood Restaurant is also popular. To avoid a long wait, put your name on the reservation list and then shop the nearby Polo Ralph Lauren store. Call 207-439-0330. Other attractions: Visit the Children's Museum of Portsmouth, N.H., 10 minutes from Kittery. The hands-on arts and sciences museum is for children of all ages. Tickets for the museum, at 280 Marcy Street, are $4 for adults and children. Call 603-436-3853 or check www.childrens-museum.org/ For more information: Log on to www.thekitteryoutlets.com or contact the Maine Tourism Association in Kittery at 207-439-1319 or the Kittery Outlet Association at 888-Kittery FREEPORT Directions: Take I-95 north to the Maine Turnpike, Exit 9. Follow the signs for I-95 north to Freeport. Take Exit 17, 19, or 20.

Lunch: The locals agree the Corsican Restaurant is a great choice for soups, chowder, lobster, sandwiches, and pizza. Call 207-865-9421.

Other attractions: See a live nativity scene at the First Parish Church Congregational U.C.C., where volunteers will be standing in as Mary, Joseph, and wise men and women. Sheep will be available for petting. Friday and Saturday 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. and Sunday 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. at 40 Main St., two blocks from L.L. Bean. Call 207-865-6022. For more information: Log on to www.Freeportusa.com or contact the Maine Tourism Association in Kittery at 207-439-1319 or the Freeport Merchants Association at 800-865-1994.

Sahinler listed 26th biggest ready-to-wear manufacturer

Ankara - Turkey's Sahinler Holding is listed the 26th biggest company in the world in the ready-to-wear sector, according to textile sector magazine Wir Schafft. The holding ranks fourth in children clothing. Sahinler Holding President Kemal Sahin said that his company sells 50 million items of clothing in 306 stores in Europe and the United States every year. Adesa, Zutano, Mills for Kids, Mill Jeans, Bil kont jeans and Jeanthy Vestino are Sahinler's own brands. But the group also produces for leading brandnames such as Direktions, Oxide, Noxon, Vision, Fila, Puma, Walt Disney, Nautica, Polo, Otto, Gerry Weber, Furby, Action Men and Alberto.

Anatolian businessmen see a bleak year ahead

Ankara - A survey conducted by the chamber of commerce in the central Anatolian town of Kayseri showed that 95 percent of Turkish businessmen have rather dim expectations for 2001. They described 2000 as a year of frustration. According to the survey, 92 percent of Anatolian businessmen describe 2000 as a year of economic crisis. While 74 percent of them are found to have been affected by economic crisis adversely in 2000, 6 percent made use of opportunities emerging from the crisis.

JEANS IS ON THE COMEBACK TRAIL The Times of India December 29, 2000

BODY:

BANGALORE: Jeans is on the comeback trail. Barely a few months ago, the big story was about denim's decline and the shift in the youth wardrobe collection in favour of an assortment of other fabric and styles, notably khakis and cargos.

But the tide's turning again. Denim's very much on the revival path, though not in the same old fashion. No, the body hugging, tapered, faded, jaded and tough look is not the only kind which is carrying good old jeans forward. Softer feels, lesser weights, darker colours, cleaner and crisper looks and, yes, even flares and embroidered borders are now very much in.

"Across the globe, there is a tremendous resurgence in denim. It began a few months back in the US and it's now caught on in India. Since August this year, the amount of denim fabric we've sold each month has been the highest ever," says Govind Mirchandani, president of Arvind Clothing, India's largest manufacturer of denim fabric and the company that markets leading jeans brands like Lee, Newport, Flying Machine and Wrangler.

Levi Strauss India managing director CS Suryanarayanan echoes this. Says he, Just a year ago, people were advertising primarily non-denims. That's no longer so. Besides, denim is now increasingly becoming a fashion product. For a long while, the emphasis tended to be on marketing. But now product innovations have again come to the forefront and is driving the market."

And therein lies the bigger story. Jeans is no longer just about giving a rugged or casual look. It's also about making a fashion statement. And leading that trend are top US designers--Tommy Hil Figer, Ralph Lauren, Nautica, Calvin Klein, Kenneth Cole, all of whom have entered the jeans market at the top end. And the impact of that is being felt right down.

Among women, there is a growing preference for stretch denim, flairs and superflairs, low waisters, light weights, dark colours and embroidered borders. Among men, tapered cuts are out, boot cuts, straight cuts and low waisters are in, as are a variety of looks - the clean look, the tinted look, destroyed look, torn look, sprayed-paint look.

According to Mirchandani, denim manufacturers have lately done a lot towards innovating on fabric, and garment manufacturers on finishes and fits. We now use some 14 different fabric for jeans, while sometime ago, it was barely two or three," says he.

Adds Suryanarayanan, The possibilities that exist with denim are so many. However, I also believe that even though the fashion segment may be leading the revival today, the core of the market will remain the five pocket classic jeans because it blends so well with the lifestyle of the youth. You don't have to iron it or wash it for a long time, and it lends itself to so much use, misuse and abuse, something you just can't do with any other fabric."

Local garments makers are assured of continued government support to be more competitive in the world market and help sustain its quota commitments.

Trade and Industry Acting Secretary Thomas Aquino has stressed the importance of enhancing the capabilities of the garments industry with the support of the Garments Textile Export Board (GTEB), an attached DTI agency.

Aquino said that large foreign buyers are willing to increase their purchases from the local garments manufacturers.

In the first nine months alone, the United States had imported a total of $ 1.7 billion worth of garments from the Philippines.

GAP, Inc., a leading USbased garments firm accounted for 12.14 percent of the total exports which amounted to $ 206.22 million.

GTEB which administers the Philippines' quota export reported that the US remains the biggest market for locallyproduced garments and products.

GAP tops the list of 30 leading American garments importers that sources their requirements from the Philippines.

Other top-ranking buyers include Wal-Mart ($ 43 million), Ann Taylor ($ 41.7 million), Liz Claiborne ($ 38 million), and Kasper ($ 36.4 million).

Ann Taylor, Polo Ralph Lauren and Warnaco exceeded their imports from the Philippines in the first three months of the year.

The top 30 American garments importers accounted for half of the total exports to the US market. The other leading buyers of Philippine garments include Jansport, Samsonite, Nike, Disney, Sears, Khol Department Stores, Nautica and J. Crew.

The GTEB noted that the Philippines ranked 10th in terms of value in a report by the International Business and Economic Research Corp. (IBERC) in the first half of the year.

IBERC is an American consultancy company that supplies commercial intelligence report on garments quota management.

Other American leading brands that buy their garments from the Philippines include, J.C. Penny ($ 35.5 million), Jones Apparel Group ($ 32.7 million), Phillips Van Heusen Corp. ($ 22.5 million), Federated Department Store ($ 22.2 million), Baby Togs ($ 21.4 million), Samsonite International Corp. ($ 17.4 million), Wear Me Apparel ($ 17.01 million), Sears Roebuck & Co. ($ 16.6 million), Disney Store, Inc. ($ 15.8 million), Dayton Industries ($ 15.24 million), Paragon Luggage, Inc. ($ 15.22 million), Osh Kosh B'Gosh, Inc. ($ 14.9 million), Nissho Iwai American ($ 11.7 million), Oxford Industries ($ 11.6 million), Levi Strauss ($ 11.4 million), Jordach Ltd. ($ 11.3 million), and Mast Industries ($ 10.4 million).

LENGTH: 1080 words

HEADLINE: Nautica Enterprises, Inc. Announces Third Quarter Fiscal 2001 Results

DATELINE: Jan. 10, 2001

BODY:

Nautica Enterprises, Inc. (NASDAQ: NAUT) today reported sales and earnings for its third quarter and nine months ended December 2, 2000.

For the third quarter, net sales increased 5% to $178.5 million from $169.9 million in the third quarter of last fiscal year. Net earnings were $16.5 million compared to $17.7 million in the prior year period. Diluted earnings per share increased to $0.50 from $0.48 and basic earnings per share increased to $0.52 from $0.51 in the third quarter of last year.

Additionally, the Company has decided to discontinue its NST brand sold through the athletic specialty chain channel and re-evaluate such brand's position in other channels of distribution. This move will enable the Company to focus its resources on its faster growing divisions. Excluding NST brand products for the third quarter of both the current and prior year periods, net sales would have increased 8%.

For the nine months ended December 2, 2000, net sales increased 11.3% to $469.1 million from $421.4 million in the same period last year. Net earnings were $33.0 million compared to $36.1 million in the prior year period. Diluted earnings per share increased to $1.00 from $0.98 and basic earnings per share remained constant at $1.03.

Harvey Sanders, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Nautica Enterprises, Inc. commented, "We are pleased with our overall results for the third quarter, which clearly reflect the broad-based strength across our businesses, as evidenced by the strong retail sell-throughs that we experienced during the Holiday season. The Nautica brand name continues to command widespread recognition among consumers resulting in double-digit growth in our jeanswear and sleepwear divisions, as well as heavy customer traffic in our retail stores. Additionally, sales trends among some of our newer growth vehicles, most notably John Varvatos and Nautica Europe, have outperformed our initial expectations."

Mr. Sanders added, "We continue to be encouraged by the performance of our brands at the retail level, despite what has been a challenging environment. As we look to the balance of fiscal 2001, we believe we will meet analysts' current consensus estimates for the fourth quarter."

Mr. Sanders concluded, "Overall, we have a sound growth strategy in place and remain committed to fostering the development of our new businesses. To support this growth, we are building a new 500,000 square foot distribution center in Martinsville, Virginia, a move that will enable us to double shipping capacity and eventually lower costs. While our results for fiscal 2002 will be impacted by costs associated with this new distribution center, we expect to realize significant operating efficiencies that will support the long-term growth of the Company."

Nautica Enterprises, Inc. (NASDAQ: NAUT), through its subsidiaries, designs, sources, markets and distributes apparel under the following brands: Nautica; Nautica Competition; NST- Nautica Sport Tech; Nautica Jeans Company; John Varvatos; E. Magrath; and Byron Nelson.

HEADLINE: STICKING TO THE BASICS; FIVE-POCKET LOOKS, VINTAGE FINISHES DOMINATE FALL COLLECTIONS.

BYLINE: Cunningham, Thomas

BODY:

As fall 2001 rolls around, don't expect any big surprises from jeans labels. As many -- but not all -- of the leading names work to recover from a difficult holiday, they are focusing on delivering understandable product at the right price.

That means that, by and large, basics are getting more play than fashion and what newness there is in the market is based around exploiting trends that have already been validated -- closer-to-the-body fits, five-pocket jeans, vintage looks and a shift to lighter-weight denims. Coated, slick and shiny denims are out. Now it's all about texture, meaning that sanded, sandblast, cross-hatch and streaky denims are in.

"We're making a very strong denim statement," said Paulette McCready, president of Nautica Jeans Co. "We don't have a lot of gimmicky stuff. Vintage, especially in our selvage jean, is very important to us. We are also doing more with lightweight denim. It seems to be everywhere right now."

"The carpenter is still the number-one category for Lee Dungarees, but the biggest category improvement is the five-pocket," said Gordon Harton, president of Lee, which is a division of VF Corp. "We're seeing a shift to lightweight denims, twills and cleaner looks. We're also trending towards a darker range in terms of denim washes."

"There is a move away from those techno, slick, coated denims to a more natural comfortable look," said Robert Arnot, chairman and chief executive of I.C. Isaacs, the U.S. licensee for Marithe + Francois Girbaud. "There is a trend towards cleaner styles that look slimmer but still have a relaxed fit."

Vintage is a key initiative virtually across the board. Makers such as Nautica and Edwin are capitalizing on the trend with their selvage-seam product, while most other labels are producing jeans in distressed, whiskered and abraded denims. To better exploit the trend, labels are also introducing lower-waisted and flared, or boot-cut, models.

"We're getting back to our roots as a great American denim brand," said Andy Hilfiger, vice-president of Tommy Jeans. "The '50s and the '60s -- that's where great denim came from. We've narrowed our assortment and we're showing more basics."

Levi's is courting younger customers with a new look that incorporates "thin-twin," 1/4-inch-spaced, double-needle stitching and a new tan thread color. The look will be offered in three new fits, an oversized baggy, a boot cut and a "welder," which is an updated carpenter. In its more contemporary SilverTab label, Levi's is introducing laser-etched camouflage denim and an updated five-pocket with new pocket styling.

Diesel is leaping into an icy theme with green selvage seams, and is also continuing its immensely successful dirty denim, adding new washes and treatments. Guess is introducing two new silhouettes, "loose fit" with a low waist and full thigh, and "new classic," which has a low waist and a straight leg.

Polo Jeans is also introducing new fits: "low rider," a low-waisted five-pocket and a low-waisted boot-cut with a 19-inch leg opening. Fashion deliveries include jeans with leather details on pockets and waistbands, as well as Civil War-inspired jeans with ribbon stitched down the outside seam. Polo is also shipping its "extreme sandblast" jeans and corduroys, which have an almost bleached effect created by heavy sandblasting.

Calvin Klein is venturing into lighter fabrics with a new 11-ounce dark denim. The designer is also adding a new slim jean and a low-cut straight-leg model. For finish novelty, Calvin Klein is relying on overdyed denims, aged finishes and a broken twill denim.

For fall 2001, almost all of Lee Dungarees' fall line is in 12-ounce or lighter denims, with surface interest coming from cross-hatched or slubbed finishes to give the effect of ring-ring spun denim. Key products include a "carpo" (combination cargo and carpenter) and a "dungaree-khaki," which is a jeans silhouette in an 8 1/2-ounce twill cleaned up with welted back pockets and single-needle tailoring.

To expand its vintage-oriented offerings, Nautica is introducing a low-rise jean with a nine-inch front rise, and a boot cut with a 19-inch knee and leg opening. A new green-casted indigo dye called "six percent teal" and a denim that incorporates a copper-like metal thread also add newness.

Silver Jeans is continuing to push its "future-retro" look, which features single-needle tailoring in indigo and blue-gray denims in a clean finish, and is continuing with corduroy, which did well for holiday. Mavi is introducing a twisted-seam model, expanding its vintage line with a wider offering of cross-hatch denims and introducing a shantung cotton fabrication.

Edwin is looking to ride the retro fad with its vintage line and a new low-rise, boot-cut jean. For fall, Todd Oldham is sticking to lightweight 10- and 12-ounce denims in lighter shades and destructed washes, and adding a low-waist boot-cut silhouette.

Also jumping on the vintage bandwagon, Unionbay has produced a great-looking sanded and whiskered jean. The label is also focusing on lightweight and cross-hatched denims. Rapidly emerging young men's brand OTB is introducing a "formatic," twisted-seam model and a "triple-zip," nylon/cotton pant that can be zipped off to either flood pants or shorts.

HEADLINE: Focus on Manhattan;
 One man's black and white look at a colorful city

BYLINE: By Nancy A; Ruhling; STAFF WRITER

BODY:

In the black and white photograph, which was taken from the Queensboro Bridge, the skyline of New York is shrouded in wispy mist and fog on a snowy, cloudy day. When did the city last look like this? Was it the 1940s or the 1950s?

Another shot, a closeup of one of the bridge's steel girders defined by its simple geometry, symbolizes the strength of the city and those who made it great. You'd have to travel back in time - all the way to the Great Depression of the 1930s - just to recapture that scene.

Or you'd have to travel the city with Jefferson Hayman and his camera. Hayman lives in the here and now in Long Island City-but his photographs live in and for the past. "Although New York City is the subject you see in the photos," says the 31-year-old photographer, "the real subject actually is nostalgia."

Hayman, an artist whose specialty was drawings and art history, rediscovered the old New York and began recapturing images of it on film about 2 1/2 years ago.

"I'd like to capture the mystery, the glory of early New York," he says. "One of my favorite things about New York is when it rains. I always walk in the mist and rain, and it always becomes the New York of the past because the fog covers the skyscrapers. I also like end-of-day shots because you can see layers of the city."

As Hayman flips through the images in his portfolio, New York of the past comes into sharp focus.

There is the Port Authority, reduced to what he calls a black evil square. There is a view of First Avenue at 34th Street, where the only objects in the camera's eye are trees rising out of the ethereal mist. There is an eastbound look at Macy's, flags whipping in the wind as a shadowy Empire State Building looms in the background.

Steichen. "I am haunted by Steichen," Hayman says, "and I avoided taking a photo of the Flatiron for a long time. I finally decided to shoot it while riding on the top of a double-decker bus on a cloudy day. The sun is in the background, but the clouds made it look like the moon."

To complete the nostalgic picture, Hayman, one of the gallery directors of Eli Wilner & Co. Inc., where his framed, limited-edition works, $3,500 to $ 8,500 each, are on exhibit, places each photo in a vintage frame. He says working for Wilner, who is responsible for making the world understand that antique frames are art, inspired his photography. "I hang the frames on the wall empty like sculpture just as Wilner does and I try to compose a photo to go inside each one of them," he says. "This is what the 19th Century academic painters did. I also fiddle with them in the darkroom. I discovered a trick that allows me to imitate the photos of an older time."

Hayman has had several shows recently, including one last month in SoHo, which sold out. His photographs are in many private collections, and four of Rockefeller Center were recently acquired by Nautica, which plans to put them in its flagship store that is being built there.

"Jefferson's photos are sublime," says collector Curt Johnson of Manhattan. "He is the Edward Steichen of our time. The photos evoke the true spirit of the city then and now. It's impossible to buy just one. When you see them, especially in their antique frames, you want the whole collection."

Sometimes it is what can't be seen that Hayman finds the most intriguing photographic subject. Blank billboards, for example, attract his and the camera's eye.

"It's kind of that vacancy, that kind of in-between New York," he says. "They are so rare because they disappear within a day. They could be movie screens waiting to be filled with old films."

Or he might add, with his own photographs.

In addition to his cityscapes, Hayman is working on some nostalgic still lifes and is starting a series on Zeppelins and one on bridges that connect Manhattan skyscrapers.

But his first love will always be New York, the city that inspired his art.

"I grew up in a farming community in Pennsylvania," he says. "I escaped from that and came here. It was always uninspiring to me, and the city and my art are my salvation."

His photographs, he says, are a way not only to show others the new New York, which is the old New York re-emerging, but also to say thank you to the city that he always dreamed of.

"I want to continue to document New York City because it is changing so quickly," he says. "I'm interested in the themes of construction and deconstruction. You don't know whether buildings are going up or down. I got great shots of the January snowstorm. I can't wait to get them developed because this is the first snowstorm that has happened since I became a photographer."

Jefferson Hayman's photographs are on exhibit at Eli Wilner & Co. Inc., 1525 York Ave., Manhattan, 212-744-6521.

JOHNNY Cash, Darryl Dawkins, Clarence Clemons and an array of former New York Knicks have at one time or another walked through the doors of Frank's Big and Tall Men's Shop, Route 35 in the Ocean Plaza, but today it's 6-foot 3-inch Frank Haftl, of Little Silver, who's on the prowl for slacks.

"This is the best place in town," says Haftl, 66, explaining that he's been buying suits at Frank's for at least 15 years. "The tailoring is good, and they're family people. They get to know the customers."

Operations manager Ken Marowitz, 35, whose father, Hy, is the owner, looks on while a tailor assists Haftl. The store, he notes, is more than happy to outfit someone from head to toe, and they can do it in all the name brands - Polo, Tommy Hilfiger, Nautica and Levi Dockers. But there's just one hitch - the customer must in some way be, well, large.

"We're exclusively big and tall," Marowitz says. "You and I would be out of luck shopping here."

Pants sizes run from a 34 waist to an 80 waist, and most customers fall somewhere in the middle, he says. Suit jackets range from a 42 extra long to a 74 regular. And footwear sizes start at 9 1/2 and go all the way to 18.

Marowitz's late grandfather, Frank, a Russian immigrant, started the family business in the early 1900s when he opened a tailor shop in New Brunswick. His three sons, including Hy, now the sole owner, expanded the business after World War II, taking on the big and tall theme, and expanding the operation to include seven Frank's Big and Tall stores in New Jersey. The Ocean Township store opened in the 1960s, across the street from the present location.

"I believe we're the oldest big and tall men's store in the country," Ken Marowitz says. He adds with a laugh, "A bunch of short, little guys saw a need for it."

But only in recent years have big and tall shops been able to offer such varieties of clothing, according to Marowitz.

"Years ago, it was just polyester," he says. "And you could get anything you wanted, as long as it was black, navy or brown."

A MODEL LIFE With upcoming appearances in a commercial and magazines, Hailey Steyn is poised for stardom

HEADLINE: A MODEL LIFE With upcoming appearances in a commercial and magazines, Hailey Steyn is poised for stardom

BYLINE: PATTI MARTIN/WHATEVER WRITER

BODY:

IN many ways, Hailey Steyn appears to be a typical teen-ager.

She works at McDonald's, listens to Incubus and tries never, ever to miss "Roswell" on Monday nights. She's more Della's than the Gap and works hard to maintain her honor-roll status.

On the other hand, how many teens end up placing in the Top 15 in the National Finals of the Ford Supermodel of the World Contest? Or get to do runway modeling for Nautica? Or find their faces in the pages of Italy's Amica magazine?

Within the next couple of weeks, Hailey seemingly will be everywhere. Her spot in the Phillip Morris Anti-Smoking campaign commercial will debut during the Super Bowl. The photo shoot she did for Twist will be featured in next month's issue. She goes out for modeling interviews regularly and was one of two finalists for a foreign magazine cover (uber-model Kate Moss, who ultimately landed the cover, was the other finalist).

And did we happen to mention that Hailey, a freshman at Jackson Memorial High School, turns 15 tomorrow or that she only started in the modeling business 10 months ago?

So while she may appear to be just one of the gang, Hailey Steyn is poised for something bigger.

"The Look." Model Team Model Management President John Merriman knew that then-14-year-old Hailey had something special almost from the minute Hailey walked through the office doors last March. It was in the midst of the agency's open call, where Merriman and others would see nearly 2,500 people over a six-week period.

"She had a nice presence about her," Merriman recalled. "And she has a very timely look, an edgy look. I saw a spark in her and knew she wanted it."

For Hailey's part, the trip to the Ocean Grove-based agency was just one more thing to try. It was on the advice of her drama coach that Hailey gave Model Team a call.

"I loved watching the fashion runway shows on television," Hailey admitted. "They looked like so much fun."

So when my drama teacher said I should give it a try, I did."

Within a month, Hailey was part of the Model Team family.

"I really couldn't believe it," Hailey said. "I was excited but didn't make a big deal about it. I really didn't even tell many people, just a few close friends."

Model Team worked for several months, preparing her for the world of modeling and for the Showcase where she would be on view for industry giants, including the famed Ford Modeling Agency. Called "The Night Gallery," the showcase was an opportunity for the models to show what they were all about, said Merriman, who staged the event.

From there, the rest is history.

After visiting several agencies in New York, Hailey ultimately signed with the Ford Modeling Agency's Women's Division. Model Team acts as her booking and consulting agency.

Soon the jobs started pouring in - a YM fashion show, two runway shows for Nautica, Italy's Amica magazine, Seventeen, Twist and the anti-smoking television campaign.

"It's really fun, but it's really a lot of hard work," Hailey admitted. "It may look glamorous, but it's not."

Trips into New York and elsewhere for jobs create a juggling routine for Hailey - homework, modeling, school activities, after-school job and, of course, chores.

Hailey makes her bed every morning, helps around the house, banks her modeling money and uses her fast-food job money for daily expenses.

"I don't want other people to do for me, I want to do for myself," she said. "I don't want to be going to my parents to have them buy me this or that, and so that's why I have a part-time job."

The modeling money goes into a separate account for "important" things, such as a college education.

"I have every intention of going to college," said Hailey, whose favorite high school course is social studies. "And that's what that money is going to help me do - pay for my education."

Although she describes herself as shy, Hailey's mother, Petra, sees a different side to her youngest child.

"Hailey's a very level-headed person," Mrs. Steyn explained. "She has a sweet, genuine spirit. She cares about her family and she cares about her friends. The modeling really hasn't changed her at all."

Part of that has to do with her family, Hailey acknowledged, and part has to do with the group of friends she hangs out with.

"They don't let me get away with anything," Hailey laughed. "I have a best friend who will say things straight out to me. She's not afraid to speak her mind."

Little by little, students at her school are learning a little more about what she does in her spare time. She told close friends about the runway shows. More people heard about her foray into the contest world.

"It's not like you go up to people and say, 'Hey, I was in the top 15 of the (national finals of the) Ford Super Model of the Year Contest.' That's not who I am," Hailey said. "But some of my friends told other people and then some of my teachers heard about it."

While nerve-racking, the competition was a "once-in-a-lifetime" kind of experience.

"I just did it; I really didn't think about," Halley said. "I took it seriously, but wasn't too serious about it. I wanted to have fun - and I did. I met some really great girls and I stay in touch with some of them."

Things might change slightly for Hailey once the TV commercial starts airing on Sunday, and Amica magazine hits the newsstand in the next week or so.

"I don't like a lot of attention," Halley admitted, "and some people mistake my shyness for being stuck-up. That's just not the case, that's not who I am."

Who she is, she said, is just another teen who likes to listen to music, hang out with friends and indulge, every once and in a while in a piece of chocolate.

"I like who I am," she said. "I'm comfortable with how I look. And when I get turned down for a job, I don't take it personally. It's not me they're turning down, but rather that I'm not the right look for the job. So be it."

IS your portfolio active enough?

When Americans dissed desk culture, outdoor sportswear companies stepped in. Now some of those companies are styling the masses, and their stocks are on a massive upwards run.

In the past year, Columbia Sportswear Co. has jumped a whopping 183.59 percent. Timberland has risen 205.41 percent. Nautica - a more fashion-oriented company with a sportswear bent - is up to $19.25 from $11, or a respectable 108.11 percent.

On the other hand, many fashion companies haven't done as well. Guess is down 69.38 percent. Gucci is down 13.27 percent. Until Donna Karan announced her buyout, her company's stock was down 25 percent.

So while the fashionistas crowd into the tents at the 7th on Sixth shows in the next two weeks, smart investors will be ignoring the shows and their hype in favor of down-to-earth outdoorswear stocks and their to-the-heavens gains.

"In general, if you look at it, the outdoor casual sportswear companies have been picking up simply because of a taste shift," said John Taylor, sporting goods analyst at Arcadia Investment Corp.

But it's more than a fad. A cultural change, several years in the making, is towards "more individual types of sports and attitudes," according to David Campbell of Merrill Lynch.

After all, Taylor pointed out, "even Morgan Stanley allows people to dress business casual every day now."

And for some, even business casual can be too confining; think sweats or jeans.

"I think people got Gapped out," said Michael Shea, at D.A. Davidson & Co. "Athletic footwear in general is doing better because of the move towards denim and away from khaki. That's got to be part of the equation."

Urbanites are in on the action. New Yorkers have been seen navigating the concrete jungle in hiking boots and fleece jackets.

Several companies leading the charge are out of shareholders' reach. Eastern Mountain Sports, Patagonia and L.L.Bean, which sell outdoor gear as well as apparel, are privately held. REI (Recreational Equipment Inc.) is co-operatively owned by its members.

But investors can get a crack at Timberland, traditionally a footwear company that's branched out into apparel. Analysts praised its strong fundamentals, good management and new products. Campbell said Timberland's new products account for 40 to 50 percent of its incremental revenue growth, more than double what they accounted for a few years ago. Lee Backus of Buckingham Research said the company's apparel lines are taking off, and several offerings on its expanded boot line - including its "work casual" boot - have proven to be very popular.

Portland, Ore.-based Columbia Sportswear is another favorite. Its foundation is outerwear, but it has been expanding its footwear and sportswear divisions. Outerwear demand has been unexpectedly strong, and Taylor said the company has had "minimal closeouts and minimal moves to push end-of-season goods through."

And analysts said Columbia has made some good investments. Among them, it bought bootmaker Sorel last year for a steal, almost doubling its footwear business overnight. It paid $8 million for the bankrupt company, which Shea said had about $60 million in revenues last year.

Both Timberland and Columbia have been aided not only by changes in taste but also by (what has become) unusually cold weather - and by the disintegration of The North Face, a popular brand that proved the "outdoorsy" label is no guarantee of success. It was bought up by VF Corp., home to Wrangler and Lee.

Both Timberland and Columbia Sportswear reported strong earnings last week.

The Big Three sportswear companies - Nike, Adidas and Reebok - have also been helped by a dress-down, although its effects may have been diluted. Campbell said an increasing focus on outdoor sports and fashions has drawn interest away from team sports, which are the Big Three's bread and butter.

Backus stressed that there's more behind the successful companies than Americans' fashion sense. And, he said, other solid, more traditional fashion companies are also benefiting from casualization - but they haven't yet attracted the same level of investor attention that Timberland has.

Kenneth Cole, for example, was at $29.25 in January 2000 and is at $38.63 now. Ralph Lauren has jumped from $17.44 to $24.30. Backus said Columbia and Timberland are great companies pretty well valued, while the others could be more of a bargain.

"Ralph Lauren certainly makes suits and dress shirts, but the majority of their line is casual sportswear," he said, adding that not everyone brings the outdoors inside. Even now, "a person is more apt to wear Kenneth Cole or Ralph Lauren to the office."

The first day of men's New York runway shows didn't exactly rock fashion's world. On the heels of the Parisian dramas, American designers played it simple, safe and salable for fall 2001.

Nothing was risky, even denim behaved itself. The American trend is no trend, just personalized style -- which can be a good thing.

But don't mistake the serene for a want of vision. Companies like Nautica and Tommy Hilfiger have to play their best hand for fall if they want to recapture the fleeting affections of retail and Wall Street. Both wisely capitalized on their strengths -- Tommy continued to wave his preppie flag, while David Chu championed outerwear as the piece to build a man's wardrobe around.

Nautica turned out one of its best shows in seasons, combining the rugged with the refined. Chu was involved in every step of the runway show and it showed.

The designer handpicked pieces from his luxe-based Nautica Europe line to combine with tailored clothing, jeans and functional outerwear. What made the show stand out was how it was styled to how real men dress without losing runway polish. A long shearling duffel coat was worn over a jeans-jacket and felted wool pants; a peacoat-inspired sport coat was paired with a chunky turtleneck and wool pants with topstitched pockets and adjustable cuffs.

For once, models looked at home in these clothes. And it was nice to see a show about strong, real clothes -- not a flight of fancy, a women's wear afterthought or a half-baked presentation thrown together to get press assembled.

Without Nautica Enterprises, men's runway wouldn't really exist this season. Indeed, Nautica and Nautica-backed John Varvatos are among the few men's names that pop out on the anemic Mercedes-Benz Fashion Week roster.

And all the accolades Varvatos has garnered in the last year has fueled -- competitively, or friendly we don't know -- Chu's design talent and attention to detail.

Tommy Hilfiger pulled together a tight representation of jeans and sportswear that reflected his renewed design philosophy -- create what you do best and stick with it. The overdone, too trendy pieces of seasons past have been replaced with classic, modern sportswear.

However, classic does not mean hackneyed. Painted suede shirts, rugby shirts and Nantucket-like pinwale corduroys with the most discreet logo made straightforward sportswear look good-boy sexy. Very student council president.

Stripes, paisleys and leathers found their way into layered sportswear. A fine-striped turtleneck was worn under a bolder-striped suede shirt, while a zip-front sweater with a perforated leather inset was combined with a camel hair blazer and velvet pants printed to look like a donegal tweed.

Tommy Jeans had a youthful, all-American look, but it was not exclusive to the young-only. These were pieces for any regular guy.

Smartly, Tommy didn't leap on one denim trend and overplay it -- the look for fall is any wash and available in any fit that suits a man's style. Workwear, rock-and-roll and classic Western Americana all inspired this season's jeans in a subtle way. Tommy pulled everything together from disparate edges of pop culture and was able to create a concise theme that looked natural and easy.

"The jeans are eclectic," said Hilfiger, who sold his preppie point by wearing his father's repp tie to his fashion week presentation. "It's about a man interpreting them in his own way -- in his own colors and the way he likes to live."

Ron Chereskin, too, borrowed from the modern idea that classic tailored clothing and sportswear can live together happily and look good. He was right in some instances, and very wrong in others.

First the right. Chereskin deftly paired his sportswear looks, like luxe shetland sweaters with distressed suede pants or a fair-isle sweater with clean white denim pants. But sweaters have always been Chereskin's strong point.

The designer fell short when pairing sport coats with sportswear. The jackets were ill-fitting and looked uncomfortable on the runway.

And when making a first, strong, formalwear statement -- stick to it. Mixing formalwear pieces with liquid leather jeans and velvet is a bit premature.

BODY:

Nowhere has the conundrum of running a profitable fashion company been more evident than in the fall 2001 menswear shows. It's a stretch to even call it a seasonal preview, since it only lasted three days -- Thursday to Saturday. And some of the more influential companies -- such as Calvin Klein and Ralph Lauren -- did not participate. For menswear, Klein has given up New York for Milan and Lauren prefers not to present his men's collection on a runway. Other designers did not show because they are going about the exhausting task of trying to find financial backing to keep their businesses afloat.

Yet despite all of that, this season was rich with wearable, elegant and bodacious menswear. Afro-British designer Ozwald Boateng offers proof that men can wear colors such as lavender and chartreuse and still appear masculine, reliable and professional. Joseph Abboud and John Varvatos explore earthy textures and the muted tones of the forest, the desert and the sea. John Bartlett links clothes to the emotions. And Sean "Puffy" Combs proves that bad publicity and the allure of tight security can fill the house like nothing else.

It would be an exaggeration to call this a Golden Age of menswear, but it certainly represents a bright, shining and unforgettable moment.

Perhaps what makes this seem like such an optimistic time for men's fashion is the rise of Varvatos. He has been in the menswear industry for years, but he has only recently launched his own collection. His is the sort of clothing that attracts a variety of men with its easy cuts, its luxurious fabrics and the confident styling that is both of-the-moment and timeless. His simply cut camel car coat could just as easily be worn by an investment banker, an advertising executive, a senator or a survivor of the dot-com wars. The beauty of it comes not from elaborate cuts and distracting details but rather from the elegance of the fabric and the way it drapes across a man's shoulders.

The clothes are manly in a way that has not been chic in recent years. The garments celebrate muscles and broad shoulders -- the lean sort achieved by those with a devotion to the gym. But they are also kind to the physique of a man who gives up his bench press time to put in a few extra hours at the office.

Varvatos's collection is filled with touchable items such as chocolate brown suede trousers and fitted ribbed sweaters. His coffee-brown striped suit is reserved but slightly eccentric. It has the look of a treasure one might discover hidden in the back of grandfather's closet. And his shearlings have the impact of luxury without the weight of ostentation.

Varvatos inhabits that elusive ground where restraint meets indulgence, gay meets straight and fashion savvy is indistinguishable from effortlessness.

John Bartlett celebrates manliness. He always has. He has analyzed its many facets, from the way in which the feminine informs the masculine to the hyper-masculinity of Tom of Finland's sketches of burly woodsmen. But he always seems to come back to the idea of man as protective, heroic, brave and vulnerable. That is, man as soldier.

Bartlett didn't stage a formal runway presentation. Instead, he created a living tableau -- a makeshift army hospital -- in his showroom. Models lay on cot after cot in a darkened room. A single, low-wattage bulb illuminated each immobile man. Overhead lights flashed on and off, in sync with the hypnotic, desperate wheezing of a respirator. The effect was of a walk through battlefield triage. And if a model should move suddenly or if his eyes should flicker open, there was a sense that one had intruded. That one was caught in a moment of voyeuristic embarrassment shamelessly admiring these wounded young men.

But one was forced to stare, to wait patiently for the next flash of light just to determine if the stripes on a red ribbed sweater were woolen or suede or perhaps leather. (They seemed to be suede.) Belts and waist wraps were modeled after elastic bandages that might stabilize broken ribs. Woolen trousers had large cargo-style pockets. Heavy navy coats had sturdy metal buckles. Sweaters were heavily ribbed or adorned with a buckle or a camouflage lining or some other reference to a uniform.

It was impossible to discern how these clothes might drape, since all the models were stretched out face up or face down and some were completely covered by one of Bartlett's army blankets. From a practical standpoint, that was certainly frustrating. But it was also clear that this was not a collection about silhouette as much as it was of details -- the pin-tucking in a shirt, the industrial zipper on a pair of leather trousers or the covered buttons at the hem of another pair of pants.

Bartlett says he has lost his fervor for fashion shows -- never mind how financially draining they can be for a cash-strapped company. (He is not designing a womenswear collection for fall 2001. Instead, he's taking the season off to reorganize and find a financial backer.) "I just wanted to do something different," he says. "I've been inspired by art lately and we've been talking about doing something like this for years."

Joseph Abboud has also given up on fashion shows -- at least for a while. And while he did not dabble in installations or happenings, he organized a cocktail party. And while loft space and sober musings might reflect the point of view of Bartlett, flowing champagne and the cool sex appeal of his co-host, actress Kim Cattrall, is more in keeping with Abboud's devotion to glamour. "Men are getting dressed again," he says. "This whole casual thing, I think it's done." It is a wish as much as an observation.

So there are his men in their shades of camel or forest green and their mixture of tweed and moleskin and wool and suede. The two-button suits and the turtlenecks are not particularly flashy or the sort of pieces that turn up on the covers of magazines with buzz. But they are luxurious and elegant and slightly formal, and now as dot-coms are going bust and President Bush is proclaiming the White House a more formal place, the clothes seem just right.

In the midst of so much formality and restraint -- testosterone wrapped in cashmere and tied off with a silk four-in-hand -- one wonders what became of the urban movement, that hip-hop, logo-driven, attitude-laden style spawned by black men that has dominated these runways in past seasons.

It has grown up. Matured. Gotten smarter and more mannered. Marc Ecko of Ecko Unlimited has blended African chic with American street and preppy reserve to emerge with a style that included navy blazers with skull-and-crossbones crests and torn argyle polo shirts. Fabrics with patterns inspired by mudcloth have been transformed into shirts and trousers that have been piled onto the body in the manner of a global nomad.

Tommy Hilfiger has turned in his street credentials -- they were really just on loan, after all -- and gone back to a preppy aesthetic. David Chu at Nautica is focused on giving customers more of the reassuring sportswear that already hangs in their closets: toggle coats, worn-out sweaters, cargo pants.

The black man's urban athlete persona has been traded in for the black man as object of glamour. Designer Ozwald Boateng offered a British take on this high-wattage style by applying Savile Row tailoring techniques to his mod silhouettes and his acid color palette. Why is it that purple suits or chartreuse overcoats always seem to have a pimpish look? Most likely because they're poorly made. Rarely does a master tailor apply his techniques to suits the color of a fresh clementine.

Boateng does. His devotion to traditional British tailoring lends soothing gravitas to his chartreuse windowpane one-button suit. He lines his black evening suits with violet satin. He keeps the cut lean so there's never too much purple wool flopping about. And he keeps the styling conservative. Who needs double-wide lapels when those very lapels are the color of a ripe raspberry?

The finale to the menswear shows here was, for all intents and purposes, the runway presentation of Sean John, the line from Sean "Puffy" Combs. They say there is no such thing as bad publicity. And indeed, the media attention devoted to Combs's trial on charges of gun possession and attempted bribery only increased the interest in his show, which was also being broadcast live on cable.

There are no official records on this topic as far as we can tell, but one could probably safely assume that the Sean John show may represent the first time that a designer's criminal defense attorneys occupied front-row seats -- Johnnie Cochran and Benjamin Brafman attended Combs's presentation. As for the specter of the trial hanging over the Saturday night show, "It's an interesting time. Ben and I are very supportive of him. That's why we're here," Cochran said. "But we still worked today!" (One assumes the fashion show hours were not billable.)

Combs proved he is an unflappable showman. His video screen backdrop flashed New York street scenes, historical civil rights movement footage as well as bits of performances from folks such as the Notorious B.I.G. His musical medley pumped up the enthusiasm and offered a reminder of just how he managed to build a multimillion-dollar music empire.

And the clothes. There were dark baggy jeans with matching jackets; bleached-out denims with suede patches; sequined muscle T-shirts with the images of Notorious B.I.G., Jimi Hendrix and others. There were navy pinstriped suits bearing the Sean John label as well as dress shirts and ties.

But what distinguishes this line is the fur. The models -- wrapped in pelts of every variety, shape and color -- looked like trappers stalking in from a fresh kill. Lynx trailed from beneath denim jackets; brawny shoulders were wrapped in fox stoles; a pair of fur pants hung tauntingly low on a naked torso. Indeed, fur trousers seem to be a staple in the Sean John line.

Who will want to wear these ostentatious shearlings and sheared mink bathrobe coats? Most likely those folks who aspire to the champagne-swalling lifestyle in which no person, no indulgence is farther than a beeper or cell phone call away. The point of all of this excess is to brag about new wealth, the ability to buy anything, to go anywhere, to do anything. It is a glorification of the black man as glamorous, powerful, wealthy, celebrated.

Those simple elements were cheered in overt and ironic ways. A white model offered a black power salute and another white model's torso was covered in the graffiti message "black power." Essence magazine was elevated to the front row. A rapper on the show's soundtrack asked, "Why do I call myself nigger?" just before black men stormed the runway in Wall Street banker suits, thus confronting a stereotype and deflating an epithet.

One couldn't help but marvel at the showmanship, the skill and the intelligence of Combs. Was the fashion worth applauding? Well, no, not really. Because what was truly wearable -- the jeans, trousers and suits -- wasn't particularly notable. And well, what man really wants or needs a floor-length mink kimono?

By the end of the presentation, when Combs emerged to take his bows dressed like a recent Ivy League graduate in a navy sweater pulled over a white shirt, you could at least fathom why he received a standing ovation from his admirers. Everyone else, you assume, just found the show entertaining.

The last image on Combs's screen was a quote from Maya Angelou: "You may trod me in the very dust, but still like dust I'll rise." Combs waved to the audience, hugged his mother and retreated backstage.

BODY:

WHILE most men haven't a clue what they're going to wear tomorrow, designers have already figured out how guys will dress come fall.

Males bent on looking up-to-the-nanosecond might slip into Wall Street-worthy pinstriped suits with pocket squares-but crank up the cool quotient by adding heavy black combat boots. Or perhaps the man of style might reach for a suit in screaming green, or with enough sparkly metallic thread to light up the night.

But wait. After three days of menswear shows in and around Manhattan's Bryant Park, it's clear that fall also will usher in plenty of reality-grounded, easy styles that don't walk the wild side or scream "trend." The season brings rustic textures, be they softly constructed tweed sport jackets or the ubiquitous corduroy suit; any color as long as it's an earth tone, and cozy clothes including chunky sweaters handknit with matching scarves.

But for entertainment value, the must-see show (which plenty of people did see, since it was televised live Saturday night) belonged to Sean Combs, better known as "Puffy." Although the rap mogul's news coverage lately has had more to do with the courtroom where he's standing trial on gun-possession and bribery charges than the runway, he is the chairman and CEO of a hip-hop fashion company called Sean John (his first and middle names). Playing to an audience that included Busta Rhymes, Faith Evans, Bobby Brown, Steven Baldwin, Tina Louise and Combs lawyer Johnnie Cochran, Combs sent out business suits with combat boots and bandannas tied at the ankles, underscoring his theme of "Revolution." Make that a rich revolution, where rebels wear military dog tags studded with rhinestones. After all, when you drop nearly $1 million on a show, including $60,000 on brushed-metal invitations, it's only natural to show $28,000 genuine alligator jackets and denim shirts with inside pockets for the necessary cell phone.

"For some of the stuff, we'll see if people have the heart to wear it," said Combs backstage after his extravaganza, which included bare-chested models dripping in long mink coats. "To put some of it on, you can't be scared. You've got to have ...chutzpah."

Designer John Varvatos seems to have one foot in the world of fine tailoring and the other in rugged country looks. His chocolate tweed suits, hooded sweaters with elbow patches and antiqued leather belts coordinated with his rustic wooden runway crafted from 200-year-old floorboards from Vermont.

Touchable textures likewise fuel fall. Handknit sweaters in oatmeal shades "bring us back to traditional roots in America," said Ron Chereskin. His $150 to $350 turtlenecks and crewnecks are made individually on big looms by New York-area knitters.

The military mood isn't retreating anytime soon, judging by distressed leather bomber jackets, pea coats and BCBG's calf-high military boots- with pants tucked in. And there are still plenty of big-pocketed pants in a number of collections, meaning you don't need to rotate your cargo pants to the back of the closet yet. Also with a military feel: Varvatos' sweeping coats with 6-inch-wide cuffs replicated from a 1930s moth-eaten military coat he unearthed at a London flea market.

Designer John Bartlett likewise thinks "the most chic and elegant men's clothes come from military uniforms because the details are so functional, while the designs have authority, masculinity and power." His military-like blankets with old army stamps are worn as serapes with matching belts. In a dramatically disquieting presentation, Bartlett showed his line of combat-influenced clothes on models laid out on military cots in a barracks-like room with bleak lights.

David Chu, designing for Nautica, is inspired by naval notions. His yellow hooded rain jacket, a "foul-weather ocean breaker," is seaworthy yet stylish, matching his taxi-yellow laces on hiking boots.

Besides military men, the shows revealed another American archetype, the prepster. Tommy Hilfiger reprises the rugby-shirt-and-penny-loafer squadron in a collection that brings to mind that Ivy League anthem "Love Story" (which he just happened to have passed around to his design team).

Showing in a room aptly named the Education Center at the clubby Morgan Library, Hilfiger returned to his roots (well, a short stint at Cornell, anyway) with argyle sweaters and varsity jackets emblazoned with a maroon "H"-that would be for "Hilfiger," not Harvard.

Hilfiger smartly stayed the course of his $1.9-billion wholesale empire with the sort of clothes that first made him famous. "When you think of college campuses from the '70s, full of tweed blazers and shetland sweaters, people cared about the way they dressed," said Hilfiger, looking pretty preppy himself in pink shirt, striped tie, navy blazer and green cords. "Now it's so nonchalant and relaxed, it's a different world."

Just when men think they've mastered casual dressing, designers like Joseph Abboud begin predicting that the pendulum's swinging back.

"With the demise of dot-coms, the days of men thinking they would stay home making fortunes in their slippers and bathrobes are over," said Abboud. "I had lunch at the Four Seasons the other week, and it looked so refreshing to see all these power brokers and image makers observing style in dark tailored suits, crisp dress shirts and simple ties."

Abboud's "dressed-up sportswear" includes camel hair suits that look office-worthy with a same-color cashmere turtleneck. "Men shouldn't think of their suits as a suit of armor," he said. "The suit is a terrific sportswear opportunity to dress up or dress down."

You don't even have to choose between a turtleneck or a shirt and tie. If you're a fan of designer Gene Meyer, you wear both together. Scoring points for offering the latest look you didn't know you needed, Meyer layers stretch turtlenecks under dress shirts with striped neckwear. Well, it does show a spin on the regulation business uniform.

Novel fabrics, likewise, lend an update to mainstays of menswear. It takes a bit of confidence to wear one of the season's velvet jackets, a bit more to carry off a suit in cranberry satin or all-over metallic from BCBG.

When it comes to colors, there's more to fall than black and gray. Savile Row designer Oswald Boateng, who has outfitted Mick Jagger in lime green or purple suits costing upward of $3,000, rolls out impeccably tailored British suits in a blaze of pink, orange, mustard and acid lime.

"Color is just a tool I use to revitalize something that is old and traditional," said Boateng.

BODY:

Let the oohing begin. From an exhibition of Marilyn Monroe's personal belongings to All-American Boy Tommy Hilfiger's ready-to-wear show, New York's achingly chic Fashion Week got under way to a flurry of praise.

"Tommy's soooo wearable," declared Phillip Bloch, stylist to stars such as Courtney Love, Jim Carrey and Halle Berry, at the arrival of Hilfiger's signature collection and his Tommy Jeans line at The Hudson Library at 36th Street. Bloch was head to toe in Hilfiger, natch -- jeans with frayed edges and a big puffy jacket with a copper zipper, from the last collection. "I love the frayed edges. Aren't they great? It would take me years to get them like that," he giggled.

Hilfiger himself explains that the jeans range is aimed at young men with active lifestyles who board, skate, listen to music and want to express themselves as individuals. But he hopes that the jeans wearer will eventually graduate to the classic look in his sportswear line, designed for more mature, slightly more sophisticated individuals who may be married, secure, and who love classics.

After a pummelling on the market and shrinking sales, Hilfiger is leaving the ethnic look to others, while he serves up what he knows best -- classics with a twist. Using colour to punch up a look, he adds maroon stripes to grey and navy, combines navy, burgundy, tan in a layered outfit for an eye-pleasing effect.

Jim Moore of GQ, who thought it was a fantastic range, noted that Hilfiger has gone back to his roots, the all-American look he began with before branching out into the baggy clothing adopted by hip-hop kids and black urban shoppers. Orange showed up on several outfits as an accent. Of course his signature red, white and blue combos, which reflect the star-spangled banner are still in evidence. "Sometimes I think it's hard for men to accept colour, but the way he does it, it is weathered," said Moore. "It's weathered barns and Nantucket," he added, nostalgically.

Hilfiger later expanded on this East Coast theme. Where are all the colour combinations coming from, I asked. "I love colour, so it's easy to put colour into the collection," said Hilfiger. What about the orange Hs embroidered on to the classic pants, or the little crests on another style? "That's very Nantucket, very traditional, very New England," he said, adding that people dress like that during summer in holiday resorts on the East Coast.

Asked about the reflection of his roots in the new collection, he said, "I think they (customers) want change but they are afraid to change. We have to bring them in slowly but surely to get them into a colour, a trend, a new look." Highlights of the autumn line include varsity jackets, waxed leather jackets, cargo pants, hooded jackets, T-necks, and suede shirts. Multicoloured scarves give a dashing finish.

David Chu's Nautica collection and Everett Hall's signature line both looked great on the runway in the tents set up at Bryant Park. Chu presented nautical-inspired looks meant for the streets, rugged styles in smooth colours. Consider ice grey and ash grey teamed with off white. Silver grey and off white with a dash of orange, stone with off white. The pieces, including hooded jackets, shearlings, wool flannel trousers, cashmere sweaters and pea coats, were ideal for any sophisticated wardrobe, but never uptight. Lots of layering shown here, too. Unbuttoned style.

Although Hall also has some unbuttoned looks -- for instance, he likes coloured T-necks with many of his broad-shouldered jackets and suits -- he excels at tailoring. Luxury is his signature, cashmere, camel hair, silk and woollens that reflect their European origins. Chalk stripes in lilac, aqua or burgundy contrasted on grey wool used in tailored pieces. Shirts or T-necks in the same colours tied the look together.

Hall's customer list includes high achievers in many walks of life; Nelson Mandela, Stephen Baldwin, Sugar Ray Leonard, and Maury Povich among others.

A trip uptown to Sotheby's famed auction house was a perfect way to finish off a day in the Big Apple. The 10th floor was devoted to display cases containing mementos sent by Marilyn Monroe to her half sisters Bernice and Mona Miracle.

It was a touching and nostalgic look at the private side of this film icon. A case of junky costume jewellery, nude calendars and signed photos of the star were reminders that her life was not just on the silver screen. Her eyelet wedding dress shown in a black and white photo with first husband James Dougherty in 1942 was long to the ankle. But the dress itself on a mannequin was cut short, to be worn again, a practical move for the not-yet-successful young woman who broke into modelling by posing for department store ads. A spectacular sequined long dress in gold reminded us of her more glittering side.

The auction on Sothebys.com ends March 1.

BYLINE: By Mary Gottschalk

BODY:

NEW YORK _ As the fall 2001 men's fashion shows wind down and the women's collections begin, it's clear there are shows about clothing and one about image.

Sean "Puffy" Combs is garnering most of the publicity, but few men are going to feel comfortable walking around in a floor-length scarf made of coyote skins, and rare is the guy willing to wear knickers made of curly lamb.

Combs, who took time out from his trial on gun possession and bribery charges to stage a show of his Sean John label, did include some suits, shirts and ties. However, the wearable clothes were overshadowed by a soundtrack filled with obscenities and racial slurs, as well as a video whose scenes ranged from civil rights protests to Combs' girlfriend, Jennifer Lopez, frolicking on the beach and massaging herself on the sand.

Combs himself skipped his usual runway look of full-length white mink coat and mounds of gold and diamond neck chains in favor of slacks and a crew-neck sweater over an open-collar white shirt.

Other designers with broader appeal are offering up clothes that are both comfortable and warm for fall. Think turtlenecks, full and easy shapes, cozy sweaters and jackets in suede, leather and fur.

In casual clothing, pants are loose, bordering on the baggy in some cases, and often in corduroy or denim. Cords come in narrow pinwaives as well as more familiar widths, and are in almost every collection. Tommy Hilfiger's are in caramel and ivory, Ron Chereskin offers them in burgundy, Gene Meyer likes pearl and white, R. Scott French offers them in black and Salvatore Ferragamo has them in dark aubergine.

Alternatives include wool flannels from David Chu for Nautica and Joseph Abboud, cotton moleskin and suede from John Varvatos, cashmere from Meyer and Everett Hall, and traditional black leather pants in several collections. Cuts are either straight or full, and many casual pants have cargo pockets or carpenter pant details.

Sweaters, particularly textured hand knits, are popular. There's a smattering of sweater vests, including some Fair Isle and plaid patterns for casual wear. Jackets are dominated by parkas, pea coats and suede shearlings, with military and motorcycle looks thrown in for good measure. Overcoats remain traditional in cut and are mainly in wool. Zippers are used on many sweaters and jackets.

Turtlenecks are plentiful in both casual and dress. With jeans, they're worn under shirts, often turning shirts into jackets. Turtlenecks are also being shown with suits, giving a casual touch while remaining professional-looking. Hall showed more of his dress suits with turtlenecks than he did with shirts and ties.

Single-breasted suits range from boxy to semi-fitted with a high gorge and some peak lapels, mostly with two and three button closures. The newest look is placket jacket fronts, hiding the buttons. For the man looking to make a real fashion statement, Hall has some placket-front suits with peak lapels and asymmetrical closures. French also offers some asymmetrical jackets and coats, which offer an almost double-breasted silhouette.

Suit pants are also cut straight and loose. The question of cuffs is about even. Cesaroni cuffed every pant in his show except his cords, while Abboud cuffed none.

Suiting fabrics include traditional dark solids and pinstripes with some interesting color and pattern combinations. Hall puts a deep burgundy pinstripe on a midnight blue three-piece suit, and his glen plaid sport coat combined with houndstooth pants work beautifully because of the pattern proportions and identical navy shadings.

British designer Oswald Boateng, showing his Bespoke Couture label for the first time here, makes dramatic color statements with a lime-green suit with purple besom pocket trim and purple elbow patches on an orange jacket. For men too shy for such bold statements, Boateng also has impeccably tailored suits in dark tones. One of his fans is actor Dylan McDermott, who wears his suits on "The Practice" and attended the show.

Meyer, known for his creativity with color, also takes a flashy turn with lime-green cracked leather in a choice of blazer or pants, which he wisely did not combine on the runway. At BCBG, Azria infused cranberry wool blazers and jackets with sparkling lurex threads.

The overall message here, though, is one of reality. His observation was in keeping with what the designers themselves are saying.

Leather pants with tuxedo jackets. Shirts and ties layered under soft-collar shirts. Velvet suits with a suggestion of shine.

And turtlenecks, turtlenecks, turtlenecks.

Oh, what the fashionable fellow will be wearing next fall.

It's Fashion Week in the Big Apple, and the clothing world is looking ahead to September. It's all part of the semiannual unveiling here of designer collections, beginning last Thursday with men's wear and ending Friday with the last women's show.

This year's nine-day fashion extravaganza, named Mercedes-Benz Fashion Week after its title sponsor, features more than 90 shows staged primarily by American designers but also by talents from Russia, Finland and elsewhere.

While some designers prefer to unveil their collections in their showrooms or other spots around Manhattan, the majority of shows are scheduled almost hourly in one of four tents put up in a patch of green known as Bryant Park, a short walk from Times Square.

Many names are familiar - Ron Chereskin, Nautica, Ralph Lauren, Diane von Furstenburg, Betsey Johnson - while others are new to the scene.

And what a scene it is, with hundreds of retailers and media gathered here from around the world to track the trends as well as celebrities and VIPs with fashion on their minds.

The men's shows ran through the weekend, with the fashion world's equivalent to the Super Bowl occurring Saturday night.

That's when rapper Sean "Puffy" Combs unveiled the collection he calls Sean John. No standard fare here.

Picture mink-lined ostrich coats; "sand-blasted" five-pocket jeans; curly lamb cut-offs worn over black thermal long johns, and black combat boots anchoring everything from bleached denims to pinstriped suits.

Media hype was heightened by the fact that Combs is currently on trial here on gun possession and bribery charges from a 1999 shooting at a Manhattan nightclub. His lawyer, Johnnie L. Cochran Jr. of O.J. Simpson trial fame, sat in the front row of the show.

Not that Cochran might appear anytime soon wearing Combs' mink vest with corduroy cargo pants.

"I saw a couple suits I could wear," said Cochran, when asked after the show if he would wear any of his client's creations.

Before he could be questioned about whether or not he would wear them with combat boots, however, he was ushered backstage.

But while many of the outfits seen here are designed more for theater than real life, Fashion Week sets the tone - and the trends - for things to come.

The main message for men: Give those khakis a rest. It's time to dress up again.

But don't panic. As Nautica designer David Chu wrote in his program notes: "This does not mean uncomfortable and staid."

It does mean the continued fusion between tailored clothing and sportswear and a few new ideas about how men can pull themselves together for work or play.

The colors to watch for: Orange, in varying degrees from bright to russet. Olive, plum, cranberry and burgundy also made strong showings.

The must-have piece for fall: The turtleneck, from fine-gauge for under jackets to chunky to wear solo with trousers.

The comeback suit: Double-breasted.

And the comeback accessory: The necktie.

That's right, the tie. Although many men were unaware of its endangered species status, the fashion world has been talking about the tie's demise for years.

Now, designers are showing it again - but in more casual ways.

"The tie is back. We don't want to lose the tie from men's wardrobes. We don't have that many things to begin with," said designer Joseph Abboud, who mingled with reporters during his informal fashion presentation.

Abboud added a wool knit tie to an olive cotton shirt, zip-front cardigan and flannel trousers, for example.

He also showed a black and gray wool knit with a gray pinstriped shirt, charcoal wool trousers and a black leather jacket.

Veteran designer Salvatore J. Cesarani had another approach: He layered a shirt and tie under a soft-collar shirt and sportcoat, combining muted windowpanes, tartans, checks and stripes from the season's popular plum and olive palette.

"I want to see the tie come back. There's a need for it. I don't want men to forget formality. I showed a whole age group (of models) up here; there is a flexibility to these clothes - by the way the wearer does it," said Cesarani, after his fashion show.

As mentioned, turtlenecks are everywhere from sporty (Tommy Hilfiger's thin-striped turtleneck under rugby shirt) to dressy (Nautica's orange turtleneck under suit).

Leather showed up in new ways as well, from trims and accents to innovative looks in evening wear. Ron Chereskin paired black leather pants with a black crepe tuxedo jacket - complete with white tuxedo shirt - and also reversed the look by pairing a burgundy patent leather tuxedo jacket with black tuxedo pants.

Notable, too, was designers' use of fabrics with varying degrees of shine. Chereskin showed a shiny olive velvet suit. BCBG's men's collection included Lurex trousers and satin jackets. And a designer known as R. Scott French used the same sparkle suiting fabric for men's tuxedo jackets and trousers as he did for women's evening dresses.

Talk about his-and-her fashion!

BODY:

MTV UK & Ireland has signed a 12-month deal with US menswear brand Nautica Jeans, to create MTV-branded merchandise, including jeans and jackets.

Nautica Jeans is also expected to open its first standalone store in London in early April, with a view to rolling out a chain of stores across the UK.

The deal, understood to be worth up to GBP 1m, forms part of Nautica Jeans' through-the-line sponsorship of MTV UK & Ireland's live music shows and events.

The partnership will result in the company sponsoring MTV Live - an hour-long programme that is broadcast every Monday evening at 11pm.

The sponsorship of MTV Live, which will begin later this month, will coincide with the Nautica Jeans' retail launch in the UK next month. The co-branded merchandise will be rolled out at the start of the second quarter.

This is also the first time that Nautica Jeans has included TV sponsorship in its marketing strategy.

The sponsorship will be advertised at five special MTV Live concerts across the UK over the next 12 months. Nautica Jeans will launch promotions in its UK stores, offering customers the chance to win VIP tickets to the MTV events.

Nautica Jeans general manager April Singer says: "By launching Nautica Jeans in the UK we are looking for brand awareness, but also credibility and acceptance from our most likely consumers. Music, fashion and brands all influence young adults, and this sponsorship will allow us to tap into the hearts of these genres."

An online campaign on the mtv.co.uk and nauticajeans.co.uk websites will also be launched, as part of the sponsorship deal.

BODY:

For a company that makes mostly-for-men classic apparel, Nautica Enterprises (NAUT) is exuding uncommon flair -- on Wall Street, that is. Its shares have been on fire, climbing from 8 in June to 18 on Feb. 14. The Street is catching on that Nautica's look isn't fashion-sensitive or faddish, observes Gene Fox of Cardinal Capital Management. "Nautica makes clothes that appeal to a wide range of people," says Fox, whose firm has accumulated 400,000 shares. Nautica promotes an active, outdoor image for its brand, says Fox. Helping lift the stock is a switch in market sentiment: Investors have fresh eyes for lower-valued stocks -- and for consumer cyclicals that respond well to Fed rate cuts, says Janet Kloppenburg of Robertson Stephens, who rates Nautica a buy, with a 12-month target of 24.

Expected to boost 2001 sales is Nautica's John Varvatos unit, a more pricey menswear line that's doing well in test markets. "It should add a lot to Nautica's earnings," says Fox. Varvatos is something Nautica has developed along with other new products to widen its demographic appeal, says CEO Harvey Sanders. The Varvatos line is selling at upscale stores such as Bergdorf Goodman, he says. Nautica, which posted earnings of $ 1.26 a share in 2000, should earn $ 1.37 this year and $ 1.47 next, figures Kloppenburg.

Top designers bring fashion from the runway into the home

BODY:

Donna Karan, an early fashion pioneer in the field of home design, began with basic candles (top left) and home fragrances and has quickly moved on to bedding, baskets, towels and other goods. Candles will remain a big feature, but this spring will also see the first major release of her new line of bath products, pillows and sheets. These will be showing up at major department stores such as Bloomingdale's, Macy's and Marshall Field's. Like her clothes, they display her predilection for vibrant colors. She's also been planning a chain of home stores, something that looks more likely now with the infusion of cash from the recent purchase of her company by Louis Vuitton.

Joseph Abboud, primarily a menswear designer, has also leaped into home furnishings with a look that mirrors his fashions. Monochromatic schemes with attention to interesting textures and weaves are as important in his plush bath towels (middle) as they are in an Abboud jacket or slacks. The designer may be a new player in home decor, but his plans are no less ambitious for that fact. He has launched lines of decorative fabrics, floor and wall coverings, tabletop, bedding and even a plush mattress.

Nautica, the fashion house that David Chu built, is quickly evolving into a complete lifestyle brand name with apparel and fashion accessories, fragrances, bedding, china, glassware, wall coverings and more. What interests Chu most has always been an exotic multiculturalism. Asian simplicity informs his designs for dinnerware manufacturer Pfaltzgraff, which include his Island Shore collection of stoneware, glazed in cool hues of mossgreen, pool-blue and sand (left).

Calvin Klein is known for impeccably tailored lines, simply classic patterns and a minimum of glitz. So why should his home designs be any different? His bedding, which includes Window Pane for The Khaki Collection (left), is crisp and fitted, combining grid and plaid patterns with no-nonsense, canvas-colored sheets for a luxurious contemporary look.

Versace is all about over-the-top Italianate splendor. Where Calvin or Abboud keep it cool and simple, Versace explodes with complex patterns and an abundance of neoclassical motifs. Typical examples are Donatella Versace's Marqueterie porcelain china for Rosenthal and Gianni's signature Medusa flatware (inset left), which comes in both silver- and gold-plated finishes. Bellissima!

Ralph Lauren is a ubiquitous presence in the forum of home couture and is arguably the most prodigious of the fashion designers to delve into this area of style. He has worked in practically every conceivable design vernacular, including Southwest, Spanish, Art Deco, American Colonial and Chinese. For his new Irish Coast collection, Lauren draws inspiration from the Emerald Isle with this china hutch (left). The fluted pilasters give it a classical profile, yet the hand-waxed finish on the glass doors and the use of pine impart a comfortable informality.

Tommy Hilfiger may be best known for his distinctive flag logo and goods in a red-white-blue-and-khaki color scheme, but that's not where his head was when he designed his Dune Road bed (bottom, left). Instead, he took his cue from the bright atmosphere of summer in the Hamptons, New York's upper-crust beachside playground. Gingham and florals in blue and yellow are a frilly complement to his trademark preppy style.

Etherington Mas Associates is helping to launch US fashion brand Nautica in the Spanish market for a fee of "around GBP 90 000", according to EMA founding partner Tim Etherington.

The consultancy will apply the interior retail concept, brand identity, graphics, lighting and furnishings to two stores in Marbella and Palma de Mallorca, which are expected to open in March.

"The idea is to keep the integrity of the Nautica brand that exists in the US. It's very American and is better launched as a US brand (rather than) trying to give it a Spanish feel," says Etherington.

EMA will work on brand implementation for further stores in Spain later in the year, claims the consultancy.

BODY:

Of the 85 international teams expected to start the 74th Bacardi Cup Star-Class Regatta at noon today, one has nothing left to prove.

Skipper Mark Reynolds, 45, of San Diego and crew Magnus Liljedahl, 46, of Coral Gables sail into Biscayne Bay on the crest of a wave few sailors experience in their careers, much less in one year.

The team won the gold medal in the Star class in the Olympic regatta at Sydney, Australia, last summer. They topped a fleet of 112 boats in the 2000 Nautica Star World Championship. And they shared the Rolex Yachtsman of the Year Award.

But both still want to win the Bacardi Cup - Liljedahl for the fourth time and Reynolds for the seventh.

"I always look forward to it, even though it's the year after the Olympics," Reynolds said. "It's good competition, great racing. Olympic year or not, it's a race everybody wants to do."

The two climbed into their 22-foot Star keelboat Saturday for their first sail together in a month. Reynolds spent part of last week coaching the crew of Pegasus, a Farr 40 competing in the Acura SORC off Miami Beach. Liljedahl, a yacht broker in Fort Lauderdale, was busy looking for a new home and photographing boats.

"This is an off-year, so you can get away with a little less effort," Liljedahl said. "We still have a lot more time in the boat than the others do. I don't think anyone coming to the starting line has done more than us. It would be almost unfair for us to practice in the boat for a couple of weeks."

Starting at noon each day, sailors will compete in one race daily through Friday over a 10.5-mile Biscayne Bay course.

The team with the best finishes in five of six races will win the 2001 Trofeo Bacardi, a heavy silver cup filled with rum.

Last year's winners were Canadians Ross Macdonald and Kai Bjorn - their second consecutive win and fourth overall.

"Bacardi puts on a show," Liljedahl said. "And we hope they'll keep it going forever and ever."

THE OPTICAL Zone, located at Shop 14, York Plaza offers a comprehensive range of products and services for testing and meeting your needs for eye care. Their thorough eye examinations include tests for glaucoma, cataracts and other common complaints.

According to Ian Lawson, manager of The Optical Zone, We specialise in contact lenses. Therefore, patients can access all types of contact lenses whether hard, soft, disposable, coloured or clear. We also store solutions that complement the sale of these products.

Additionally, customers can get minor repairs on frames and auxiliary parts for their eye wear at the store. Top designers such as Giorgio Armani, Tuscany, Sophia Loren and Nautica are featured in the convenient dispensary, which has hundreds of frames.

After being examined by the doctor, patients are then passed on to a customer representative who patiently helps to outfit him/her with the right frame to suit their features.

Mr. Lawson seems particularly proud of the service offered by his staff. We offer personalised service and even special discounts to all teachers and students within the country, he remarked.

We also have a short time turn-around time (on average three to four days) between order and down payment and collection of prescription glasses, Mr. Lawson added. There is also a same day or next day express service for an additional fee.

The Optical Zone, is striving to offer the best in eye care and wear for the diverse Jamaican market. They stick very closely to the appointment schedule, so there is no long waiting period before the fashionable glasses or contact lenses you desire are finally yours.

HEADLINE: BRANDS' NEW PLAN: UNDERCOVER; athletic sportswear companies, marketing strategies

BYLINE: Feitelberg, Rosemary

BODY:

NEW YORK -- Athletic companies are trying to show teens they know what's up.

In an effort to be more in the know and less in your face, activewear makers are brushing up their images with a low-key approach. The aim, of course, is to attract ever-fickle teenagers who are less interested in labels than their elders are.

In other words, "Kids don't like to be walking billboards," said John Shanley, senior vice president of First Security Van Kasper.

Action sports brand Vans earns high marks from him for making a point of not using its brand name distinctively in advertising and marketing. Quiksilver, which hasn't lost its edge despite the tidal wave of surf-inspired brands, also picked up an honorable mention from Shanley.

On the other hand, Nike and Reebok have been too heavy-handed with their sport-specific marketing featuring high-profile athletes, executives said. That strategy does not compute with the kids in the skateboard park or riding BMX bikes, who favor individualism instead of team sports, they added. Playing up a lifestyle instead of a brand is more in sync with Gen Yers' mind-set, Shanley said.

"Retailers are really fostering the change, by asking manufacturers to be less obvious. Teenagers don't want overplayed logos on their apparel or shoes," Shanley said. "What they're really doing is taking a potshot at the Nikes of the world that believe the brand name is first and the product and lifestyle are secondary."

Through a new three-year deal, NBC Sports will air the Vans Triple Crown Series, an action sports competition, for the first time. This year, 10 hour-long programs are scheduled to run from May through the end of December. The event will feature skateboarding, wakeboarding, surfing, snowboarding, BMX, freestyle motocross and supercross.

Vans solidified its ties to the birth of skateboarding, when the documentary "Dogtown and Z-Boys" picked up two awards at this year's Sundance Film Festival. Stacy Peralta, the film's director who won the Documentary Director Award, used to be a Vans-sponsored athlete. Vans helped finance the film.

Sean Penn -- who's character Jeff Spicoli in "Fast Times at Ridgmont High" was known for his black-and-white checkered Vans sneakers, as well as his classroom pizza deliveries -- narrated the film. Peralta's reaction to the documentary's success echoes Vans commitment to the formerly outcast action sports market.

"I am completely blown away by the audience's response to the culture we presented in the film," she said. "Here we were, a bunch of losers that stuck to what we believed in, and are getting rewarded for it down the road."

Gary Schoenfeld, president and chief executive officer of Vans, said the company's support of the film "further distinguishes its unique heritage."

When working on its debut apparel line, Salomon designers opted for embossed and tonal logos placement, said Lisa Vinciguerra, apparel category manager. The collection ships to stores this fall.

"The idea was not to scream Salomon," she said. "We wanted it to be a discovery. When someone says, 'Nice jacket,' they can say, 'Oh, it's Salomon.'"

Big mountain skier Jonas Soderqvist, a Salomon-sponsored athlete, said his friends seek items they can wear walking down the street or right off the hill. He also said several people have approached him and said, "Where did you get that? It's sweet."

Janet Freeman, co-owner of Betty Rides, a snowboard label, said the best way to be cool is to be true to your brand.

"There is no strategy to being cool here," she said. "We advertise in snowboard magazines. That's it. We're a small company. We do what we do. Small, independent ski stores are the backbone of our company."

Freeman speculated that Nike's decision to pour millions of dollars into athlete sponsorships and hefty advertising budgets has come back to "haunt" them in the form of consumer backlash.

The real trick is to appeal to women on different levels, since they have such varied interests.

Emily, a label produced by San Francisco-based Cosmic Debris, is popular with skate shops and goth shops, said Matt Reed, co-founder. The latter refers to stores that specialize in gothic-type apparel such as drapy black skirts and long velvet coats. Emily, an image of a brooding dark-haired girl who favors black and has a posse of cats, is imprinted on T-shirts with such sayings as "Disobey," "Problem Child," "I Want You to Leave Me Alone," and "Be All You Can't Be."

Skateboarders, snowboarders, surfers and other action sports athletes relate to that attitude, since they enjoy what used to be sports dominated by boys, Reed said.

"Emily represents this attitude lifestyle that can't be pigeonholed," he said. "That appeals to girls, not just skaters and goth girls."

Emily stands to gain more fans once Chronicle Books publishes an "Emily" book in August. Miramax Films initially approached Cosmic Debris about making an Emily action film, but Reed insisted on an animated one, so talks fell apart, he said.

For back-to-school, Hot Topic will run a major program with Emily, plugging the apparel, accessories and new book.

A few seasons back, New Balance followed the recommendation of a buyer from The Sports Authority and scaled back its logo placement and the reception has been "terrific," said Judson Van Corps, apparel product manager for New Balance. The company expects women's apparel sales to increase by 150 percent this year, he said.

"Consumers didn't want to be screaming a brand name," he said.

When its used, the New Balance logo is about two inches instead of three. The use of heat-applied reflective logos or embroidered ones lend themselves to smaller sizes, Van Corps said.

In addition, women are wearing more revealing single-layer items like bra tops and tanks to work out, and they don't want logos that draw attention to their chests or hips, he added.

Even Nautica has taken a more low-key approach with logos on its Nautica Blue swimwear. For the first time this year, the company designed an image of a sailboat to use on the line. Tonal logos are also used more prominently instead of on the brand's name.

Lynn Koplin, president of swimwear firm Apparel Ventures, the maker of Nautica licensed swimwear, said, "It's a little more understated. We don't want to blast the name on anyone."

Deemphasizing logos makes sense, since most teens shop for fashion first, according to Kevin Umeh, president of Element, an online service that tracks teen trends.

"If you're not on trend, you're losing the battle and no amount of advertising or marketing will compensate for that," he said. "Teenagers have their own style and they want to own it."

Canadian police seized $800,000 worth of clothing this week with counterfeit Tommy Hilfiger, Calvin Klein and other designer labels at the stores of Cohoes, a Quebec retail chain.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police said more than 9,000 articles of clothing from Cohoes stores in Montreal, Trois Rivieres and a warehouse were examined by experts from Tommy Hilfiger, Chaps Ralph Lauren, Calvin Klein, Nike, Timberland, Levi's, Nautica, Gap, Old Navy and Banana Republic. Cohoes president of operations, Ami Kaminsky, said he was troubled by the seizures and denied he knew that the chain, founded in 1980, was knowingly selling counterfeit goods.

Kaminsky is co-operating with the Mounties, who are investigating Cohoes' suppliers, police Sergeant Gilles Blanchet said.

The maximum penalty for forging trademarks in Canada is a fine of $1 million and/or five years in jail.

DESIGNER'S WEB SITE HONOURED A Canadian fashion designer's Web site finished among the top five finalists in the e-commerce division of the prestigious Flash Film Festival, held in San Francisco on Feb. 12.

Minimidimaxi - The Canadian Fashion Stage, created the site for Toronto fashion designer Ula Zukowska. Minimidimaxi (minimidimaxi.com) is an electronic marketplace for Canada's dynamic fashion and apparel industry.

The festival competition and gala held during "Flash Forward 2001" conference honoured the best creative work on the Web using the well-known Flash animation software. A jury of top Flash designers and developers chose Zukowska's site www.ula2.com from more than 1,500 nominations.

Zukowska's fall/winter 2001 collection fashion show and Ula2 furniture will be showcased at 2 p.m. on March 21 at the Bata Shoe Museum.

A multimedia presentation, prepared by Minimidmaxi, will feature highlights of the ula2.com Web site. To attend RSVP by March 20 to 416- 348- 3007.

DIGGING FOR A DIAMOND? According to Canadian jewellers, fancy shaped diamonds are increasing in popularity as women seek a twist on the classic solitaire. Here's a list of diamond shapes and what they apparently say about the woman who wears them.

Round: The stone of choice of an empathetic dependable woman whose first priority is always her husband, children and family.

Marquise: Women attracted to the marquise are sexy, outgoing, impulsive and zestful with a passion for life's challenges. This oblong stone's pointy ends indicate a sharp temper.

Square: A woman drawn to the clean lines of the princess or emerald cut, is an efficient leader who is disciplined and highly organized, if not a little stubborn.

Oval: The choice of the individualistic and creative woman who is at her best when employing her artistic talents. She is organized and disciplined and not afraid to let loose and show her wild side.

Pear: The woman who sports the tear-drop pear is an adventurous, gregarious type, who likes to be liked and has a wide circle of friends and acquaintances. Once community and social obligations have been met, she likes to unwind in the comfort of home.

LOPEZ CLOTHING LINE Jennifer Lopez is planning to follow in the footsteps of her ex-boyfriend Puff Daddy, aka Sean Combs, by moving into fashion design, Vogue UK reports.

The curvy Latina singer, whose plunging forays into the fashion world have more than once landed her on the front pages, (most notably when she wore that Versace dress to last year's Grammy Awards), has hooked up with Andy Hilfiger, to launch her latest project. Andy, younger brother to all-American style maker Tommy, has engaged Lopez to create a line of women's clothing for his new company, Music Entertainment Fashion Inc. He is hoping to clinch some of the hip young things who were once such fans of his brother.

NEW YORK -- Lilly Tartikoff may have been stranded in Los Angeles, but about 200 accessories executives managed to get to one of the few events that wasn't canceled because of last week's snowstorm that wasn't.

They braved the inclement weather to kick off QVC's fourth annual "Cure by the Shore," scheduled to air live from Monte Carlo on the TV shopping channel on May 19. The sale benefits the National Women's Cancer Research Alliance, which was cofounded in 1997 by Tartikoff and the Entertainment Industry Foundation to support leading-edge research in early diagnosis and treatment of all women's cancers.

In its capacity as the event's major benefactor this year, Marchon Eyewear joined forces with the Accessories Council and the Monaco tourist board to host the kick-off party. At least part of the reason for the strong turnout could be attributed to all the designer merchandise available for purchase through a silent auction.

While a pair of acrobats performed overhead in Marchon's penthouse showroom, guests bid on 24 lots, including luggage from Fendi, Prada and Lambertson Truex; handbags and accessories from Chanel, Christian Dior, Louis Vuitton and Cartier; store gift certificates from Calvin Klein, Donna Karan, Nike, Nautica and Manolo Blahnik; lunch for two at Alain Ducasse; four nights for two in Monte Carlo; a pair of Knicks tickets, and a full day at the Avon spa.

The top-selling item, and one of the biggest bargains for the evening, was also one of the most unusual offerings: a full-page ad from Departures magazine, valued at $ 49,500, was sold for $ 14,000, according to an Accessories Council spokeswoman, who noted that the auction raised a total of $ 29,000 for the NWCRA.

New colors in coats, hats and umbrellas are sure to brighten a soggy day

ROBIN L. FLANIGAN

April's inevitable showers may not be the best pick-me-up after months of bitter-cold temperatures and recent heavy snowfalls.

But at least this spring's rain gear comes in refreshingly vibrant colors and playful designs.

Bold, tropical palettes cover coats, hats and umbrellas modeled after the latest clothing styles. Even rugged, waterproof wear at Henrietta's Eastern Mountain Sports, which specializes in outdoor outfits, come in citrus, kiwi and Bali blue.

While single shades are shocking enough for many Rochesterians used to winter whites and grays, less-conservative shoppers are drawn to a cacophony of color in geometric patterns.

"We're seeing very retro, very graphic, '60s and '70s types of prints," says Ann Headley, director of product development at Totes Isotoner, which makes weather-related accessories. "It's a trend that's been creeping up on us."

The Ohio-based company dabbles in polka dots, plaids and flower motifs this season, but expects a psychedelic design influenced by the late Emilio Pucci to be one of its biggest umbrella sellers. The famed Italian designer - credited with making it acceptable, even fashionable, for women to wear pants - was known for his tight-fitting, bright-colored garments.

High-end fashion designers Donatella

Versace and Tom Ford for Gucci showed Pucci-inspired collections at their shows last fall. And plans for a string of Pucci boutiques at pricey resorts worldwide - Las Vegas and Los Angeles are possibilities - will likely mean more imitation in the future.

More raincoats are being made with microfiber, an increasingly popular material that repels water, drapes nicely and resists wrinkles.

Microfiber fabrics, made from extra-fine fibers two times finer than silk and three times finer than cotton, have been around for about 10 years but are finally edging out cotton as a base material in most apparel lines, says Fredrick Hackett, director of merchandising and marketing at London Fog.

Belted trench coats for both genders are strong this spring, with deeper pockets reinforced and conveniently located for storing cell phones, PalmPilots and other compact technological gadgets.

According to London Fog, headquartered in Seattle, women are wearing trenches at the knee, while men's lengths are shorter and more versatile than usual.

"It allows you to wear it by day to the office, and it goes easily into the evening and weekend," Hackett says of the male version.

Bad news for those who thought animal prints were on their way out: Extinction's still a long way off.

"I keep expecting them to die any second," Headley muses.

But with four patterns this season - leopard, zebra, python and abstract spots - and interest from stores for more, Headley doesn't see this fad's life span ending soon.

Crocodile, giraffe, leopard and zebra prints will cover much of the company's accessories next fall.

Oh, dry up!

Choosing the right rain-gear fabric depends on where you're planning to wear it. Here's a quick guide from www.rei-outlet.com:

Water-resistant/breathable: Perfect for arid or warm conditions - places where heavy precipitation is unlikely.

Waterproof: Used most often when temperatures and activity levels are low, but the likelihood of heavy rain is high.

Waterproof/breathable: This material has millions, even billions, of micro-pores big enough to let vaporized moisture from your body escape but small enough to keep out liquid molecules.

GRAPHIC: Make a splash in this bright purple raincoat for girls. $39.50 GapKids; A shocking array of colorful circles, Target's trademark pattern, give spring rains a retro welcome. $29.99. Target; Trench coats in stark colors and vibrant umbrellas to match are big this season. Coat by Gallery, $160; Totes umbrella, $22. ANNETTE LEIN staff photographer; This boy's coat from Protection System is water-repellent and breathable. It retails for $26.99. CARLOS ORTIZ staff photographer; Though often less colorful, men's coats are still trendy, with belts and pockets for gadgets. This Nautica trench retails for $275.

IOWA CITY (AP) - Investments by the Board of Regents should be reviewed regularly to ensure that they don't include stocks or bonds in companies with questionable business practices, a board member said.

"We ought to take a look at this," said David Nell, a regent from La Porte City.

At issue are bonds held by the University of Iowa and Iowa State University with companies that do business in Burma, against which the United States imposed trade sanctions in 1997 because of its poor human-rights record.

Since then, such companies as Wal-Mart, Kmart, Jordache and Nautica helped boost Burma's garment industry exports to the United States by 372 percent, according to State Department data released last week by Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa.

The United States imported $ 403 million worth of apparel from Burma last year, up from $ 168 million in 1999, Harkin's office reported.

The University of Iowa and Iowa State University own $ 2.2 million worth of corporate bonds in Wal-Mart. Company officials say they have not imported clothing from Burma to their U.S. stores in three years.

ISU and Iowa also have bonds worth $ 522,000 in Unocal, which holds one-third interest in a natural gas pipeline in Burma. The Free Burma Coalition has reported that Unocal knowingly uses slave labor on projects related to the pipeline.

BYLINE: Jim Reilly Staff writer

BODY:

Harvey Sanders might make his living selling style to America's young and not-so-young people, but Thursday at Syracuse University, the chairman and chief executive officer of Nautica Enterprises Inc. was all business.

Sanders spoke on campus as part of the Sue Ann Genet Lecture Series, sponsored by the College for Human Development. He brought along his chief financial officer, Wayne Marino, and a carousel of slides heavily weighted toward figures, but not the model kind.

Sanders wanted to impress on people how a $1.85 billion retailing giant such as Nautica keeps itself healthy, profitable and growing. He did it by the numbers: sales figures, percentages, target customer ages, total number of "doors" (stores) carrying particular product lines.

Sanders says the key to his company's success has been controlled growth, a tight rein on product quality and image, and diversification.

From a company known primarily for its nautical-themed outerwear, Nautica has grown into a "lifestyle brand," selling everything from sleepwear to cologne. Not to mention watches, tableware and furniture.

"People don't know we're into those things," Sanders says of the latter two, flashing slides of bowls and plates and a woman in a bathrobe sitting on a wooden chair. "We are now."

Sanders started out as a sales trainee for a bathrobe company named State-O-Maine and was its CEO by the time he ran into David Chu, owner of a small outerwear company called Nautica, in the early 1980s.

Thursday, Sanders outlined how Chu's designs and his vision - "Nautica could be a jacket, a watch, a shoe" - helped build the company into a retailing powerhouse. State-O-Maine bought Nautica and, in 1993, changed its name to Nautica Enterprises Inc.

Today, Sanders says, Nautica is in thousands of stores around the world, including 106 Nautica outlets, and continues to grow by introducing new product lines and buying others. For instance, Nautica got into golf in 1997, when it bought E. Magrath, a golfing sportswear company. Golf legend Byron Nelson is the line's spokesman.

In the fall of 1999, Nautica introduced a new line of tailored men's clothes by John Varvatos, a former Polo designer.

"You'll notice Leon Genet is wearing merchandise from our new John Varvatos collection," Sanders says, gesturing toward the SU grad (Class of '53) and benefactor of the lecture series, an auditorium and a gallery, all named for his late wife. Genet smiles and does a half turn, modeling.

Sanders says introducing new lines of men's and women's jeans, sleepwear and even underwear helps diversify products and customer base.

"We just launched boxer shorts for spring," he says. In response to a question, Sanders says "Casual Friday is here to stay" and notes that most of the sales growth in tailored men's clothing is at the upscale, high-priced end - $1,000 suits, $200 shirts, $500 sweaters - targeted by Nautica's John Varvatos line.

At lecture's end, he has hats for everybody. They bear Nautica's new Icon: the familiar sailboat, but with simpler, sleeker lines, designed to make a more "contemporary" statement.

Two top executives from Nautica Enterprises Inc., the clothing design company, came to Syracuse Thursday to cut the ribbon on the Nautica Design Studio at Syracuse University.

Harvey Sanders, chairman and CEO of Nautica, said he has been impressed with the design program in SU's Retail Management and Design Technologies department, part of the College for Human Development.

"We have SU students come down to work at our New York studios in the summer as interns," Sanders said. He and Nautica Chief Financial Officer Wayne Marino toured the new design studio Thursday, wending their way past tables, lockers and a loom as students drew, cut and painted, busy with projects.

Nautica's gift of $150,000 helped turn a classroom in Slocum Hall into an airy studio. "It's a really wonderful space for us," said Karen Bakke, chairman of the design department. "In order to do good work, you have to have a decent place to do it."

Bakke, who's taught textile and fashion design and other courses at SU since the 1970s, said she's taught classes "with chairs I picked up on the loading dock, one sink and no storage place for supplies." The new studio has plenty of new chairs, four sinks, and 150 lockers. "And the light is good," Bakke added.

Sanders, wearing a navy blue Nautica sweater, stood before a large framed picture of a J-class sailboat as he flipped through a scrapbook of student design projects. He murmured approvingly. Marino said the sailboat will be on the cover of Nautica's annual report.

Nautica's connection to SU is the friendship between Sanders and Leon Genet, an SU grad (Class of '53) and benefactor of the Sue Ann Genet Lecture Series. Sanders was the guest speaker Thursday afternoon.

"Harvey is just a real good guy. There's nobody nicer than him," said Genet, who accompanied Sanders and SU design faculty on the tour. Genet said his five children - and one son-in-law - all graduated from SU. Sanders has been on campus three times since 1995.

He said Nautica's gift was an effort "to repay the hospitality" SU has shown him over the years. He noted that Nautica clothing is popular with students, and "it doesn't hurt that Carousel mall is one of our best-selling areas."

Don't blame Hartmarx Corp. Chief Executive Bert Hand if he shudders when he sees a high-powered investment banker wearing a wrinkly pair of khakis and a sweater to the office.

The casual dressing revolution drove his Chicago-based company to the brink of extinction in the early 1990s and has plagued its turnaround efforts ever since. After all, the tailored men's suit has been the lifeblood of Hartmarx for 129 years, which makes any move from formal workplace dressing almost heresy to Hand, who favors gray pin-striped suits and two-tone shirts for his office attire.

Hartmarx's longtime CEO finds himself in the distinct minority these days.

It's hardly news that suit sales have declined steeply in the past decade. Many men now don them only for the occasional funeral, wedding or job interview. Somewhat reluctantly, Hand decided to transform Hartmarx into a maker of sportswear in the late 1990s, an evolution that has proved an uncomfortable fit for the Chicago-based apparel manufacturer.

To be sure, Hartmarx's foray into the casual world has been more talk than action. Some 70 percent of its sales still come from tailored clothing, years after Hartmarx launched casual lines such as Bobby Jones golfwear and created casual collections to extend its two best-known suit brands, Hickey-Freeman and Hart Schaffner & Marx.

Even those efforts have yielded spotty results. One sportswear collection would win raves from retail buyers, but it wouldn't be delivered on time. Next season, the goods would be shipped on schedule but the colors and designs weren't what customers were looking for.

"We tried to build a sportswear business with people who had spent their careers in the tailored business. It wasn't happening fast enough," Hand concedes.

But that transition period is over, he promises.

Last year Hartmarx took a big step forward by creating a completely separate sportswear division based in New York, far from Hand's office at 101 N. Wacker Dr. It also hired Jay Friedman, the head of Liz Claiborne's menswear, to run it. Friedman, whose career has centered on sportswear, has brought in more than a dozen sportswear executives to handle everything from clothing design to sourcing to distribution.

If anyone doubts Hartmarx's commitment to the sportswear business, they need only glance at the glossy spring catalog for its very upscale Hickey-Freeman line. Instead of the typical $1,900 gray three-button Hickey suit, the cover sports a $995 tan suede jacket, a $50 pale blue cotton T-shirt and a $175 blue silk-cotton blend sweater. Sportswear also is front and center in the spring collection of Hart Schaffner & Marx, the company's slightly less expensive, but still upscale, men's line.

Count David Trahan as a believer. He owns Galdry's, an upscale menswear retailer in Louisiana that has been buying from Hartmarx for 50 years.

When he placed his spring orders for the Hickey-Freeman and Hart lines, "It was very easy to write the order," Trahan said. "The line they are delivering right now and the one for fall are right on the money."

The "money" in this case means classic sports coats and dress pants in high-quality fabrics, accented with a few splashes of bright pink, the season's hot color. Hartmarx got it right by not overdoing pink, Trahan says, because his customers--doctors, lawyers and business owners--don't want to look like Easter eggs. Other sportswear lines such as Ike Behar overdid the color thing, and Trahan walked away placing no orders.

Still, no one can blame Hartmarx investors for being skeptical that their beleaguered company is on the right track.

Hartmarx stock trades around $3 a share, less than half of the company's $6.69 book value, and far from its high of $10 a share in 1997. As a result, the company's market capitalization now stands at a modest $91.1 million.

More distressing, perhaps, is the continued shrinkage in Hartmarx's top line revenue. Sales last year declined 6 percent to $680.6 million.

Net income soared more than five-fold to $8.8 million, or 30 cents per diluted share, but that was mostly because prior-year results were dragged down by a $6.9 million one-time charge related to pulling the plug on a systems project. Without that 1999 charge, Hartmarx's 2000 net income would have been up 4 percent, hardly enough to wow Wall Street.

Still, Hartmarx made substantial progress last year, Hand says, because it paid down $45 million in debt, leaving the company with a very respectable debt-to-total capital ratio of 37 percent.

It wasn't all that long ago that towering levels of debt threatened to sink Hartmarx for good. Debt mounted along with losses from Hartmarx's giant retail division, which had gotten its start back in the Great Depression when the company's retail customers turned over the keys to their stores because they couldn't pay for the merchandise they had ordered.

In the decades that followed, especially the fast-growing 1950s and '60s, Hartmarx added to its retail presence, stitching together a patchwork of regional chains that included Baskin in Illinois, Wallachs in New York, Raleighs in Washington, D.C., and Zachary in Florida.

But the power suit of the 1980s did a fast fade after the 1987 stock market crash, and Hartmarx began to lose big money at retail. It wasn't just the economy that was causing the pain. At the high end of the suit business, Hartmarx's stiff styling was losing ground to the soft sculptured look popularized by Italian Giorgio Armani. At the low end, Men's Wearhouse arrived on the scene and began doing a better job of selling inexpensive suits and sport coats than Hartmarx's Kuppenheimer chain.

By 1990, Hartmarx began closing stores. In 1992, it gave away its ailing specialty store division to a company executive in exchange for a $34 million note "valued at zero on Day 1," Hand said. Its retreat from retail carried a high price tag. Hartmarx's debt soared to $325 million, or 82 percent of total capital.

Meanwhile, its equity shrank to $100 million, $30 million of which came from a Saudi Arabian investor. That emergency cash infusion allowed Hartmarx to avoid a bankruptcy filing, which could have dragged down its profitable manufacturing business. But Hartmarx was left with little financial room to maneuver.

"We were in a tight spot," Hand said.

They still are, retail experts say.

The market for Hartmarx's big-ticket suits continues to shrink, while the business at the moderate-priced level is so competitive, the company decided to phase out some brands altogether. Meanwhile, plenty of apparel companies are competing for a share of the men's casual business that Hartmarx wants a bigger piece of. The big three: Polo Ralph Lauren Corp., Nautica Enterprises and Tommy Hilfifer Corp.

But the news isn't all grim. None of the three are playing at the top of their game right now. Tommy Hilfifer lost its urban cachet as it overexpanded its number of lines and stores. Nautica has missed earnings expectations amid slower sales at department stores, its key channel of distribution. And Ralph Lauren has struggled with disappointing sales at its own chain of Polo stores while its preppy English look has grown slightly stale.

Importing British designs

That lack of newness in the sportswear market may be a boon for Hartmarx, which recently signed a deal to be the North and South American licensee for Ted Baker, the hip British clothing designer and retailer.

The agreement gives Hartmarx the right to sell the same high-tech, colorful products Ted Baker is marketing in Britain as well as additional items that Hartmarx will manufacture for American distribution.

The Ted Baker line has tremendous potential for Hartmarx, retail consultants say, because the brand is relatively unknown in the U.S. market. That also means it's not a sure thing.

"It's a pretty gutsy move," said Bob Siegel, a managing director of Kurt Salmon Associates, who has worked on strategy with Hartmarx for two years. "It's going to take a lot of work and care. But it shows their commitment to being a long-term player in sportswear."

Surprisingly, the Ted Baker line also provides Hartmarx the chance to do what it does best: sell suits. British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently wore a Ted Baker "endurance" suit to pay a visit on President Bush. The high-tech, wrinkle-proof wool suit is "the perfect 21st Century suit for the likes of Tony Blair," said Hartmarx spokeswoman Adriana Payne. "You can get right off the plane and go to a meeting looking very fresh and polished."

If Hartmarx is going to capitalize on Ted Baker and other licensing agreements, it will be up to Friedman, who heads the New York-based sportswear group. His first efforts won't be visible until July, when the fall line starts arriving, but Friedman promises more pulled-together collections that are easy for men to wear.

"Everything in the line has to have a reason to be there," Friedman said. "You want the customer to wear the pants with the shirt with the sweater."

Sounds simple. But it has taken Hartmarx a long time to get its casual business on track notes Chicago retail consultant Neil Stern. "I don't think they've screwed up. They've recognized the trend, but it's been hard to turn the ship around."

BODY:

Armed with an interest in nothing in particular, Jenny Reaser stepped inside Psycho Sisters Consignment Boutique in Lilburn and began her weekly ritual of browsing.

She flipped through a rack of blue jeans, passing on those that carried such designer labels as Ralph Lauren, Tommy Hilfiger and Nautica. She then snatched a multicolored, short-sleeved, polyester blouse for $6.99 off a mannequin, and picked up a sheer Victoria's Secret nightie. In the vintage section of furs, wool coats and back-in-the-day knee-length dresses, she zeroed in on a leather-looking jacket that turned out to be a tad too big.

"Most consignment shops have clothes that no one wants," Reaser said. "But here, the selection is nice, and it changes every week."

What really moves the 22-year-old Reaser is the fact she often finds nearly new pieces from some of her favorite stores like the Limited, Express and Banana Republic, at a fraction of the costs.

"I can't afford the mall," Reaser said matter-of-factly. "So I come in here and get the same things I would find there at a really discounted price. And, they're worn in, just like I like them. So why go to the mall?"

Amanda Self's sentiments exactly. She opened Psycho Sisters Consignment Boutique seven years ago and viewed it as an alternative to mall shopping. It was the second Psycho Sisters store to open in metro Atlanta. However, she's an independent owner and operator.

Her 1,050-square-foot store sits in a strip mall on Indian Trail in Lilburn. The merchandise there runs the gamut, from the sequined, floor-length dress and powerhouse business suit to the most basic T-shirt in a range of sizes that span decades of trends. There's jewelry, shoes, handbags, incense, oils, books, crystals and CDs. There is even a casual men's wear section.

"I've got the grooviest store," said Self, dressed in bellbottomed, patchwork, corduroy jeans, a fitted T-shirt and platform sandals. "I've got suits and clothes for the professional woman and funky, far-out stuff for the teenagers and young at heart. I've got something for everybody."

According to the National Association of Resale & Thrift Shops, resale is one of the fastest growing segments of the retail industry. The organization estimates there are more than 15,000 resale shops across the country, peddling everything from precious antiques and artwork to jeans.

"My God, the dollar is not worth very much anymore," Self said. "If you don't spend it wisely, I think you're nuts. If you don't buy second-hand, I think you're an idiot."

Self's shop differs from most consignment outlets, as she buys items outright from sellers. That said, she says she has to be selective and in-the-know relative to fashion trends. Most days, she offers her customers a percentage off the prices, and there's always a $2 rack.

"In my seven years, I've seen consignment shops come and go," Self said. "It's because they don't have a clue about what's in style, and their prices are too high."

The wall near the store's register is covered with awards and plaques that list Psycho Sisters, including in some instances other stores that carry the same name, as the best consignment shop and best vintage store in metro Atlanta or Gwinnett County.

"The clothes are usually more interesting than what you'd find at thrift shops," said Katie Tsocanos, as she tried on a filmy, oversized hat. "You can best believe there's always something here that you won't find in any other place."

Self's point exactly.

Psycho Sisters Consignment Boutique is located at 900 Indian Trail, Lilburn. To reach the store, call 770-923-5228.

BODY:

NEW YORK -- Seeking to continue the strong sales that denim jackets enjoyed last year, for fall, jeans vendors are trotting out a variety of new jacket silhouettes as alternatives to the classic, fitted, waist-length look.

The category needs an infusion of new ideas to keep its momentum, vendor executives acknowledged.

"I am seeing a slowdown in the traditional denim jacket because every customer pretty much has one now," said Kimberly Hill, vice president of sales at Polo Jeans Co. "So in order to take it to the next level, it's being done in different bodies."

Polo Jeans, a division of Sun Apparel Corp., for the fall is offering a denim duster. The company will also increase its use of embellishments, such as studs and leather trimming, on its basic jacket styles.

"We all have the classic jeans jacket in our closet, so the whole idea is how do we make it new, exciting and different without losing the fact that it is a jeans jacket," said Polo Jeans creative director Chris Leba.

North of the border, Bullet Blue Jeans co-owner Roger Vignales said the Montreal-based company "needed to do something else in jackets for fall to stimulate jacket sales by offering innovation."

Bullet Blue Jeans' offerings for fall include a three-quarter-length belted coat with a sherpa-style fleece collar and a jacket with fake-fur trimmed cuffs and collar.

DKNY Jeans president Susan Davidson said, "There will always be a market for the traditional, classic, jeans jacket, but to broaden the appeal now, the definition of the jeans jacket must broaden."

She said "the sales have pretty much stayed the same for traditional denim jackets and that is probably due to the different washes and fits that we offer every season."

DKNY Jeans, for fall, is showing a fitted duster, a 3/4-length jacket, a fitted denim blazer and a motorcycle-style jacket made from denim and leather. The line's junior collection will include a pea coat with a detachable fake-fur collar and cuffs.

Sandra Campos, senior vice president of the women's division at Nautica Jeans Co., said the company will offer, in the fall, an expanded selection of denim jackets, including a blazer and trench coat.

"The customer is still wearing denim and buying denim, but she's looking for newness in denim," she said. "You see it in bottoms and you see the same thing in jackets."

Campos said the proliferation of denim offerings from designer labels, such as Chanel, Marc by Marc Jacobs and D&G, has made it easier for status brands to offer dressier denim items.

"Everyone's doing denim in some shape or form," she said. "It definitely brings it to a more aspirational level, as opposed to just being something that's worn everyday."

Even relative newcomers to the denim game are turning to updated jacket styles as the key to catching consumers' eyes.

At contemporary resource ABS by Allen B. Schwartz, which also produces Allen B., president of sales Lloyd Singer said, "we have tweaked all of our jackets that are classic in one way or another to make them more of-the-moment."

The company's fall offerings include a stretch peplum denim jacket from Allen B. and a stretch denim trench coat with leather trim from the ABS by Allen Schwartz line.

Jill Stuart Jeans, which is produced by New York-based Alpha Garment, will also tweak its jacket offerings for fall.

"Denim is a category still on fire and people certainly still need to wear jackets, but they can't possibly continue to keep buying one silhouette over and over again," said president Charles Jebara. "What we're trying to do is sort of reinvent the category through fabrications and washes and bodies."

For its inaugural spring season, Jill Stuart Jeans' denim offerings included a two-button blazer and a classic jacket in various washes. For fall, it will offer a belted barn jacket, baseball jacket, motocross jacket, ranch jacket and a short leather-trimmed blazer.

Jordache Enterprises Ltd.'s Jordache Originals line, is also seeking to re-energize the category with fashion-forward jackets.

"The jeans jacket category definitely needs an infusion of creativity since most consumers already own a basic, rigid, jeans jacket," said Jordache Originals design director Stephen Whitney Baum.

Baum said the line, which launched last November, will include, for fall, a belted duster and a coatdress.

CHICAGO retail consultant George Rosenbaum says the entire apparel market should get a lift this spring when travel picks up during the holiday season.

"When people travel, especially when they go on vacation, they generally buy new clothes," he says. "If travel plans hold up as they have been, it is good for apparel makers."

Last spring, the fashion marketers misjudged demand and were forced into heavy discounting to move merchandise. That wrecked profit margins. This year, inventories are in good shape, says CSFB analyst Dennis Rosenberg. At price-earnings multiples of between 12 and 14, except Ralph Lauren, which is trading much higher, the big names remain well shy of the multiples of 20 or more that proved unsustainable in the early Nineties.

Analysts say the sector's shares are very attractive but Liz, Ralph and Tommy's ability to live up to the hype depends on two very fickle forces - the US economy and consumer tastes.

The worse the US economy gets, the more investors love Tommy, Liz, Ralph and Jones.

Fashion designers who cater to the masses, such as Tommy Hilfiger, Liz Claiborne, Polo Ralph Lauren and Jones New York, may not be setting the fashion world on fire, but they are still standing on Wall Street's catwalk as the stock market stumbles.

So-called fashion-vendors, the firms that typically sell fashion apparel through their own outlets, big US department stores and global retail chains, are expected to outperform the general market this year and possibly next.

Shares in popular clothes makers such as Jones New York and Nautica are only slightly off recent highs, while others, such as Hilfiger, Claiborn and Lauren, have fallen 5% or more in recent weeks, but are still well above 52-week lows.

"I upgraded the sector at the end of November and even though the stocks have done well, they are still cheap," says CSFB analyst Dennis Rosenberg.

"It's a mature industry with good cash flows, generating earnings growth in double digits and selling at reasonable multiples."

When the Federal Reserve cuts interest rates, it is generally good news for consumer cyclicals, especially apparel makers. A study by Standard & Poor's, reviewing Fed rate cuts for the past 30 years, found apparel manufacturers' shares rose an average of 14.7% in the six months after a Fed move, against an average 12.3% gain for the S&P 500. With the Fed having cut rates three times so far this year, analysts are looking for a rebound in a sector not doing too badly anyway.

"People have been holding back on spending but that isn't going to last," says George Rosenbaum of Chicago's Leo Shapiro & Associates.

"Despite economic worries, incomes have generally been holding up. There is a feeling that this spring there is going to be a big improvement in apparel buying."

Some consumers never stopped shopping, especially for Polo Ralph Lauren, which beat Street earnings estimates with a 58% increase in fiscal third-quarter profits. It is doing so well in US and European upscale markets with an "American lifestyle luxury brand" that it is reducing distribution to US discount retail chains.

Shares in Nautica, which makes mostly male apparel with a sailing motif, have more than doubled to $ 18 in the past six months. Looking for a port in the storm, analysts see a safe harbour in its look, which is less fashion sensitive than most.

Falling foul of trends was part of the problem at Tommy Hilfiger last year, but the company is now being overhauled.

In the quarter to last December, earnings fell 28% to $ 42 million (£30 million). Though still beating analysts' expectations, profit margins shrank as Hilfiger engaged in steep discounting to move merchandise during the sluggish holiday season.

Hilfiger is ditching its cool, hip-hop image to return to its preppier roots by focusing on red, white and blue clothes themed as a "family brand", 49-year-old Tommy Hilfiger said in a recent interview.

Hilfiger, which last month used Lauren Bush - niece of President George W Bush - to model its collection in London, is rolling out 25 boutiques by next March, in the middle of an economic slowdown, but most analysts rate Hilfiger a "buy" or "strong buy".

Its sportswear business is said to be receiving spring orders that will bulk up sales and, at about $ 12, Hilfiger's share price is almost double its 52-week low of $ 6.31, though it has fallen from $ 17.25 in recent weeks.

Big guys no longer have a slim selection of clothing. Today, they can choose suits from Canali and Zegna, sportswear from DKNY and Polo Ralph Lauren, and footwear from Ferragamo or Kenneth Cole.

It wasn't always this way, retailers say.

'I got tired of having the Rodney Dangerfield reputation in the clothing industry-offering expensive clothes of lesser quality,' said Sam Kaufman of Kaufman's Tall and Big Shop in Englewood. He co-owns the store with his father Fred, who opened it in 1958.

They also have a store in Bellevue, outside Seattle, which opened in 1995.

'For years I've traveled extensively to get quality merchandise and overcome that stigma,' he says.

Big and tall men-whether they're musicians or politicians or bricklayers-just want to dress the same way as every other guy, he says. Among Kaufman's customers are Denver Mayor Wellington Webb; Keli McGregor, vice president of the Colorado Rockies; Raef LaFrentz of the Denver Nuggets and Matt Lepsis of the Denver Broncos.

'It has been difficult to convince some upper-end manufacturers to make our sizes, but more are waking up to it,' Kaufman says, naming Tommy Hilfiger, Nautica, Levi's, Pelle Pelle and Sean John as labels represented in his store.

(Among the holdouts are Kenneth Cole and Tommy Bahama, who still aren't making large sizes, he says)

Bob Sockolov, president and CEO of Rochester Big & Tall, which has 21 stores in the United States, agrees that merchandise selection for their stores has improved dramatically.

'We used to be the last thing on the cutting table, and we were a season or two behind. We're proud of the fact that we're now up at the fashion forefront,' he says.

'Manufacturers are seeing the light. Two years ago Ralph Lauren decided to get into the business. Before that, they didn't think we were their customer,' Sockolov says. 'Now, many of the items we're getting are exclusives or special cuttings, from (Ermenegildo) Zegna or Versace. They'll make it according to our specifications.'

Both Kaufman and Sockolov say that while the casual movement has been strong in recent seasons, they are getting more requests for suits and tailored sportswear.

'Nationwide, we have seen the effects of casual Friday, but I truly think that as the dot-com industry has suffered, there will be a spike in tailored clothing,' Kaufman says.

Sockolov agrees. 'There was a real slowdown in suits for part of last year. It hasn't changed appreciably in 2001, but sport coat and slack business (is) picking up. People are starting to dress up for meetings again, and more people are looking for jobs.'

In 2001, Nautica Enterprises expects to reach $625 mil in revenues and a $7.2 mil operating profit

BODY:

Nautica Enterprises said it expects its full-year earnings per share to match or come in slightly below Wall Street expectations.

In a presentation to investors, CFO Wayne Marino said the company expects to Post 2001 earnings per share of $1.38. The consensus estimate among analysts polled by First Call is $1.39. The company also said it expects to report earnings per share of $1.48 in 2002.

Marino also said Nautica expects 2001 operating profit of $7.2 million on revenues of $625 million. For 2002 the New York-based company is targeting revenue growth between 8 and 10 percent, and EPS growth of 6 to 8 percent.

Harvey Sanders, president and CEO, said the company has been able to sustain two years of growth through diversification and leveraging the Nautica brand. He noted that while in the past its men's sportswear business has been a driving force behind its success, he expects sales here to fall to 49.3 percent from 69.8 percent of the total, offset by growth in other areas including sleepwear and women's jeans.

Nautica is expected to open the doors of its new flagship store in New York's Rockefeller Center April 21.

BODY:

NEW YORK -- Though Nautica focused on its apparel business at Banc of America's Consumer Conference last week, it did announce that its home textiles line will debut in the big-box, specialty retailers at the end of this month.

"We're very excited," said Harvey Sanders, chairman, president and ceo, speaking to analysts, adding that the new distribution channel will strengthen and extend the brand.

Previously the Nautica home collection, consisting mostly of bedding, had been in department stores. And though it still has a "mature business" with several department store retailers, he said, "we have not gotten the support of the department stores in the past." The lack of appropriate space to display the collection was a problem, he said. "When you come out with nice things, you want it to be seen. We want to stay in business."

Sanders continued, "We will have a nice presentation in the big boxes." However, the collection won't expand too quickly. "We're concentrating on controlled growth."

Though apparel will be the focus of the first retail store in Rockefeller Center in New York, opening this month, he didn't rule out adding the home line in the future.

Keeping the Hudson River clean and Riverkeeper in business attracts the most interesting and impressive group of supporters. Aside, of course, from the Kennedy family and its obvious connection to the environmental protection group through Robert F. Kennedy Jr., Riverkeeper's chief prosecuting attorney.

Among the boldface names in the crowd for the group's annual fundraiser last week at Chelsea Piers were: Queen Noor of Jordan, Bob Pittman, co-COO of AOL Time Warner, Glenn Close, Christopher and Dana Reeve, Chevy Chase, Dan Aykroyd, Patty Hearst, designers David Chu and wife Gina and Kenneth Cole and his wife, Maria Cuomo Cole, John Mellencamp and a handful of cast members from HBO's Sex and the City and way-hot The Sopranos.

The event's annual Riverkeeper Award was given to Louis Bacon, chairman and CEO of Moore Capital Management and chairman of The Moore Charitable Foundation. More than $ 2.3 million was raised for the Hudson River effort between the fundraising dinner and auction; items up for bids included opening-night tickets to the upcoming Harry Potter movie, a Hudson River tour with RFK Jr. and a package of tickets to four summertime concerts, including N'Sync and U2.

The Riverkeeper's annual "Fisherman's Ball" was sponsored and hosted, in part, by Nautica, thanks to Chu's blossoming friendship with Kennedy. When you're listed as a top sponsor, you're certain to get one of the best tables in the house. Among those sitting with Chu for the night, Kennedy, Close and the Reeves.

Retailers taking notice of teens' buying power The Denver Post April 22, 2001 Sunday

BYLINE: By Kelly Pate, Denver Post Business Writer,

BODY:

Today's teenagers are making headlines because of their generation's record size, handle on technology and - the big carrot for retailers - buying power.

One analyst, Jeff Klinefelter, is forming stock recommendations based partly on what styles and brands teens like, the stores where they shop and how much money they spend on clothes.

Klinefelter, a senior research analyst with U.S. Bancorp Jaffray in Minneapolis, last month rounded up high school kids from nine U.S. cities, including Denver, and took them to their local malls. Klinefelter tracks chain stores that sell apparel.

Nearly 300 teens, ages 17 and 18, took part in the study, including about three dozen Denver high school students who toured stores in Cherry Creek.

'We believe a closer look at the 'Echo Boom' or 'Generation Y' demographic is more relevant than ever considering the prospects for a slower overall economic growth rate,' writes Klinefelter in his report, which was released last week. Generation Y covers people born in 1982 or later.

Lisa Herzlich, Cherry Creek mall's marketing manager, said smart retailers are embracing high school-aged consumers because they've become 'a true economic force.'

'This group makes their own choices, they have disposable income and they make their own value judgment on how fashion, price and brand meld together,' she said.

Research indicates that half the money teens spend in malls is their own, while the other half comes from their parents, a change from the past when about 70 percent of teen's spending money came from parents.

Teens involved in the U.S. Bancorp study learned theories about what affects consumer buying decisions and how fashion cycles fit into stock valuations. They were asked about their spending patterns and whether they perceived certain stores to be expensive or inexpensive. And once in the stores, the students recorded the lowest and highest prices on clothing. Again they were asked about their impressions of price in those stores.

From the study, Klinefelter gleaned some valuable information.

U.S. teenagers told him they go first to the The Gap, Abercrombie & Fitch and Express. Gap was cited for relatively affordable prices on a broad assortment of basics. Despite a recent decline in sales growth, Abercrombie remains popular, which Klinefelter attributes to the store's strong brand. And teen girls said Express has the latest styles at prices they can usually afford.

Among Denver teens, top destinations were Hot Topic, Mervyn's and Express.

Klinefelter said more teens than he expected say they shop department stores. 'It happened more consistently in smaller communities and urban communities where you have easier access to department stores or a narrower selection of specialty stores,' he said.

'It also tells me brand awareness is transferring down a generation,' he said referring to the buying habits of Gen Y's parents. 'The wide assortment of independent and national brands is their biggest strength going forward and opportunity to keep teen market share.'

Herzlich said Polo, Tommy Hilfiger and Nautica are hot brands among teens, and those clothing lines are sold in large volumes from department stores such as Foley's, Lord & Taylor, Dillard's and others.

So what does all this mean for investors?

Klinefelter looks for stores that manage their stream of inventory efficiently and where customers can find the brands they want when they want.

He said retailers must find a way to get cost-conscious customers to buy their store brands or other brands they carry - even if they're a bit more expensive. In other words, if the brand is strong enough, shoppers who set out to spend no more than $ 60 on a new pair of jeans will pay more when they find a brand they like.

'Once you have consumers' interest, you can identify opportunities for margin expansion over time,' Klinefelter said.

Abercrombie & Fitch, one of the stocks he tracks, did just that.

'They gradually gained more awareness and increased their retail pricing and expanded their margins. They were tremendously popular,' he said.

But Abercrombie took that strategy a little too far and scared some shoppers away with higher prices. To compensate, Abercrombie last summer started adding some lower-priced products, including T-shirts, to its selection.

A few other findings:

Denver teens reported the highest spending among nine cities, with an average of $ 149 a month, compared with $ 110 nationally going toward clothing. At the low end, Des Moines teens reported spending only about $ 60 a month.

Half of U.S. teens surveyed said they prefer specialty stores, while department stores won 39 percent of the vote and discount stores 11 percent, with Denver close to that average. Denver teens reported the most mall visits per month, averaging 4.1. The national average was 2.5 trips.

BODY:

CLIFTON, NJ -- Linens 'N Things hopes to resuscitate its textiles area -- the category that it had counted on to provide more than 60 percent of sales during the recently concluded first quarter -- with three new initiatives, announced last week.

"Our core textiles category was disappointing, reflecting an overall weakness in the industry," said Steven Silverstein, president. "The performance of textiles had a significant impact on overall sales."

Though he didn't delve into details, Silverstein said that it is taking several steps to improve the textile category. First, Nautica Home was just launched in the stores, he said. Traditionally Nautica has been a department store brand, and this is the first time it's entering big boxes such as Linens 'N Things.

In addition, Silverstein announced a "new and improved" solid-color bath towel program. In the bedding area, it plans to strengthen promotional items.

All of these initiatives are part of Linens' overall goal to increase store productivity and the average store transaction. The company has set a target of achieving sales of $150 to $175 per square foot, he said. As previously announced, the percentage of proprietary product is still expected to reach 15 percent by the end of fiscal year 2001, he added.

However, Linens will not concentrate heavily on driving additional traffic into the store, Silverstein said. Instead, it looks to improve sales by increasing the average transaction and its productivity within the stores. Consequently, the advertising budget will remain flat compared to last year, company CEO Norman Alexrod said.

Analysts liked the addition of a name brand to the stores but hesitated on the other initiatives. It was "impressive that they got the Nautica brand," said Shelly Hale, analyst, Banc of America, San Francisco. "Though it's not exclusive, it is a well-known brand," and a good step forward. The textiles category is a mature business, she said, and one that hasn't had strong growth in a number of years, making it a difficult category for retailers.

"Clearly, they're looking for a catalyst for reviving that area of business. Nautica might not solve all of the problems, but it is a good start," Hale added.

Joan Bogucki, analyst, WedBush Morgan Securities, Los Angeles, felt that the Nautica addition was positive, but wasn't sure whether it would solve the real problem, she said. "It's always important to change the merchandise, but you should always do that ... Fundamentally, I think it's a merchandising issue."

Increasing the proprietary percentage of the merchandise will also be "challenging," she said, as Linens tries to develop new international sources. "They still need to gain experience in that area. Crate & Barrel and Pottery Barn do an excellent job of this."

Company's 14,000-sq.-ft. flagship expected to earn $10M-$12M in first year

Rockefeller Center is a New York City destination solidly built on contrasts. It is a landmark for both culture and megabranding. It was built on lofty architectural ideals, but with hard-edged commerce to exercise. It's classic, yet modern.

And because of this endearing split personality, it is the perfect backdrop for Nautica to open its most ambitious and adventurous retail venture to date.

Moving from a quiet Upper West Side corner shop to a Rockefeller Center anchor store doesn't go without meticulous planning -- or without a real reason for being there. Nautica, one of the biggest brands in men's collection, quietly opened its first flagship Sunday at 50 Rockefeller Center (at East 50th Street) as the final piece to the company's even subtler rebranding strategy.

The 14,000-square-foot, two-level store -- made up of men's, women's and boy's wear -- is so important to Nautica's new look and business plan that David Chu, CEO, president and designer of Nautica International Inc., has been involved with every step of the store's design, planning and merchandising process. Chu designed the store with the Vandam Street firm Tsao & McKown.

Nautica's shop at West 69th Street and Columbus Avenue closed last February due to the brand's Rockefeller Center plans.

"We've never done anything this big. I've never done anything this big," said Chu. "This store is the final piece to how we position and evolve the Nautica brand. We've been through major phases with creating a new logo, new advertising, a fresher attitude in the design of the collection, and this is the final piece to the puzzle."

Nautica creatively combined its store from two distinct pieces of Rockefeller Center -- the Bank of Boston branch, located next door to The Associated Press's offices, and the old Walter Reade Theatre. The store's first-year volume is estimated between $10 million and $12 million.

Harvey Sanders, CEO of Nautica Enterprises, would not give an exact figure on the cost of the building.

"It was a pretty penny. A very pretty penny," Sanders said. "And it is worth it, because this is the first time for us to showcase all we can do and almost all of our licensed products."

"Business in the first two days has been booming, considering it was a very soft opening and we didn't tell anyone we were opening the doors. Women's swimwear, especially, has been flying out the door."

The store's sign isn't even up yet. A theater marquee refurbished to look like the one that hung outside the Reade Theatre in the 1930s will be put up before the store's grand-opening party next month.

Men's wear occupies the store's first floor, with sportswear and tailored clothing taking up the front of the stores in the old bank space, and boy's wear, Nautica Competition and Nautica Jeans occupying the Reade Theatre. A walk-through alley between the two spaces is reserved for men's accessories and fragrance.

Tsao & McKown and Chu paid homage to the landmark buildings, incorporating the art-deco front door and the floor slanted for theater seating into the retail space. Sailcloth has been draped at the theater stage's edge to create two billowy dressing rooms for Nautica Jeans.

The store will serve as a model for future Nautica freestanding stores -- with the next one scheduled to open in May in Portofino, Italy.

The upscale men's Nautica Europe collection will be added to the store's mix next month. The designer said he will be creating special men's and women's sportswear groupings for the store each season.

Constant change and the brand's evolution are felt in every corner of the store. Blonde ash and brushed-steel fixturing are modular and movable to create and redraw the retail floor. Most of the store has been styled for its opening to show off Nautica's signature navy-and-white.

In an innovative merchandising move, a 10x10-foot room has been broken away from the main part of the women's wear area to showcase a theme, or to reinforce a singular design statement.

Right now, the room features everything colored white within Nautica's women's collections -- from swim to bucket hats, leather pieces and a long linen blazer. Swimwear is whimsically displayed on rings that flip, similar to the way poster shops show off lithograph prints.

Chu said the store's selection will be constantly remerchandised to keep up with trends -- and the crowds in Rockefeller Center. The store, Chu and Sanders agree, provides Nautica with an unfettered relationship with its customers. From this, Chu believes, his collection can only grow stronger.

"We are getting strong feedback already. We can already see and hear what items the customer is responding to. What they like and dislike," said Chu. "Together with having all these products in the same location and seeing how well they tie together only makes us better."

"This is how we see the collection," he said. "Sometimes department store presentations leave out a collection's reference point for the customer. This is a new position with the brand and we are a little more modern in feel, and we want to show that. We want the image to be true Nautica and not what people can see uptown at Bloomingdale's and downtown at Macy's. We are giving them reasons to come to this store, too."

BODY:

Not too long ago, Chevrolet engineers went snowshoeing in Aspen, Colo., with a group of designers and athletes from The North Face, the San Leandro, Calif. maker of rugged outdoor gear and apparel.

On the challenging trek, they bonded and brainstormed about co-creating the ultimate outdoor vehicle.

"It would be pretty cool," said Tony Posawatz, assistant vehicle line executive on the 2002 Chevrolet Avalanche, who attended the unusual business gathering. The group's fantasy vehicle "would have things like a built-in bug zapper. It would have a satellite dish for global positioning out in the woods. There would be an aerodynamic tent that stays attached to the back, even at speeds of 80 miles an hour."

Those flights of fancy have yet to make it beyond the middle-of-the-woods talking phase. In the meantime, Chevrolet and the outdoor supplier came up with The North Face edition of the Avalanche, a new crossover that converts from a six-passenger sport-utility vehicle to a full-size pickup.

Chevrolet has had links with non-automotive firms in the past, from Ducks Unlimited to GT Bicycles, but this is one of the first efforts in recent memory to result in the development of an actual product, according to Posawatz. The North Face had turned down offers from other automakers to partner in the past. But they jumped at the chance to work on the Avalanche, because they were included two years ago during the design process, when they could have a greater influence on the end product. Both say they hope the Avalanche is the beginning of a long relationship.

"We expect there to be more collaborations with The North Face in the future," Posawatz predicted.

Adds Victoria Hernandez, director of brand management for The North Face: "It's a natural fit and helps us to reach a broader audience than we would reach with our own marketing."

The North Face Avalanche is the latest in a string of so-called affinity marketing vehicles that seem to be infiltrating the automotive marketplace. Often, outdoor outfitters are the most natural partners for the makers of SUVs and trucks. Ford was one of the first to capitalize on this trend in the 1990s, with offerings like the popular Eddie Bauer edition of the Ford Explorer. Chrysler followed suit with an Orvis model of the Jeep Grand Cherokee.

Apparel makers are another favorite partner. Witness the Nautica version of the Mercury Villager minivan. More recently, Japanese automaker Subaru debuted a 2001 L.L. Bean edition Outback wagon, linking up with the Maine outdoor retailer.

But there are unexpected pairings, too.

Bugs Bunny is featured prominently in the Warner Brothers edition of the Chevrolet Venture minivan, which offers families a built-in video entertainment system. Lexus linked up with leather-goods manufacturer Coach to create the latest in a series of special-edition ES 300 sedans. In the 1980s, Chrysler had a similar arrangement with Mark Cross.

More recently, Lincoln unveiled the $58,800 Neiman Marcus Edition of its all-new 2002 Blackwood luxury truck. Customers will be able to order the special-edition Blackwood starting on May 4.

The special-edition Blackwood features headrests adorned with the Neiman Marcus logo and entertainment elements like a built-in DVD player with Panasonic wide-screen monitor.

"That one in particular takes excessiveness to the limit -- in a fun way," said Jeff Schuster, director of North American forecasting for J.D. Power and Associates in Troy. "You take an upscale truck and you put an upscale retail image with it. It creates a buzz for both brands. But the brands must complement each other. You wouldn't want a Target edition Blackwood. It's not the right image."

Matchmaking between automakers and retail brands is a trend that is only just beginning. To make it work, the two audiences must be similar, say experts inside and outside the auto industry. If the alliance works, it expands the consumer base for both brands. Because of their money-making potential, the pairings are likely to continue.

"Consumers will see more of their favorite brands linked up with vehicles in the future," said Schuster. "There's a move to market more toward individuals, as opposed to just selling mass-production vehicles. Co-branding is one way to achieve this, although it does command a premium price tag."

The 2002 Ford Explorer XLT 4WD is priced at $29,745, while the Eddie Bauer version of the same vehicle retails for $34,055.

A base 2001 Lexus ES 300 has a $31,395 sticker price. The Coach edition costs another $3,000 on top of that and adds upscale items like a Coach duffel bag, Coach logos inside the cabin, plus perforated-leather seats and bird's-eye maple trim.

A base Subaru Outback wagon starts at $22,895. We tested the L.L. Bean edition with a $29,990 price tag and a new 3.0-liter six-cylinder engine. L.L. Bean logos are splashed all over the wagon, from the seats to the fenders and floor mats. It also has luxury amenities like an eight-way power driver's seat, two-tone leather-trimmed upholstery and a security system.

There's plenty of attention to branding inside the Outback, but we were disappointed that at least one critical feature was overlooked. If the front passenger flips down her visor, it hits and jars the rear-view mirror -- a distressing situation for the driver. We loved the looks of the L.L. Bean edition, but wondered how a wart like the errant visor got by Subaru and the L.L. Bean people.

As Schuster warned, we were hard pressed to find any bargains among the co-branded vehicles we checked.

A base four-wheel-drive Avalanche starts at $33,965. The North Face Avalanche is priced at $37,465. Granted, it does have some unusual touches. The special-edition Avalanche comes with an exclusive sage green exterior and a cabin that is decked out with The North Face logo everywhere, from the white instrument cluster to the floor mats and green-and-black seats. Also included are two day packs that hook onto the backs of the front seats, plus two waterproof duffel bags that the retailer made exclusively for Chevy.

An engine-block heater and standard four-wheel drive are part of The North Face package, along with a premium off-road suspension and a high-capacity air filter. Chevrolet says this special edition will be available by August.

Like the snowshoeing partners, we did some brainstorming of our own.

Technicolor Knits

Next week's showroom sale at this Fashion District sweater house is focused on the bright side of spring, offering fresh-looking women's designs in a rainbow of seasonal shades. Color selections range from sky blue to turquoise, coral, scarlet, lime, flame and bubblegum pink, along with cooler neutral tones like classic black and burlap, and the styles are equally plentiful: There are rib knits, cable knits, cardigans, V-necks, halters, silk-lycra blends, twin sets and more; normally $50-$200, most now are reduced to $20-$90.

ERIK STEWART, 1441 Broadway (between 40th and 41st streets), 34th floor, Manhattan, 212-944-9096. April 30-May 9, Monday-Friday, 9 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

Rush-Hour Rewards

Plan on taking a later train home next Tuesday through Thursday, because this upscale warehouse sale is a commuting consumer's dream. In a new space across the street from Penn Station, a sample sale specialist is bringing together an incredible array of high-end designer apparel, footwear, accessories and home furnishings-and offering them all at savings of 60 to 80 percent below retail. The wearables here are mostly for women (though there should be some men's merchandise), including clothing from Helmut Lang, Prada and Mui Mui, along with shoes, boots and sandals from the likes of Robert Clergerie, Charles Jourdan and Freelance. Handbag selections are by Prada, Fendi and DKNY, while sheets, duvets, towels and other home designs bear such prestigious labels as Frette, Polo Home and Nautica. Apparel will be priced mostly from $20 to $200, shoes from $39 to $69, and accessories from $30 to $450.

ASHLEY REED TRADING SALE, Event Center at Hotel Pennsylvania, 401 Seventh Ave. (between 32nd and 33rd streets), ground floor, 888-937- 9006. May 1-3, Tuesday-Thursday, 8 a.m. to 8 p.m.

Art and Soul

Since charity auctions are held to raise money for good causes, they might sound like bad places to find bargains. But the opposite is true: Except for a few highly contested items, it's possible to pick up most lots for well below typical gallery price. This year's auction at the Garden City Jewish Center includes lithographs, serigraphs and original works from such well-known artists as Jane Wooster Scott, Norman Rockwell, and Leroy Neiman, and also features a selection of film animation cels and sports memorabilia. All works are custom-framed, matted and ready to hang, and opening bids start at up to two-thirds less than the gallery price. The $5 admission fee benefits local churches and synagogues, and includes refreshments, hors d'oeuvres and desserts.

SEVENTH ANNUAL ART AUCTION at the Garden City Jewish Center, 168 Nassau Blvd., Garden City, 516-294-4634. Saturday, April 28, preview, 7-8 p.m.; bidding at 8 p.m.

Crafts and Collectibles

While April's weather hasn't been entirely spring-like, this weekend brings some signs that the season is under way: The 20th annual Spring Antiques Show heralds the start of the Hamptons' antique fair season, with a one-day show featuring furniture and collectibles. Meanwhile, back in the Big Apple, the Spring Crafts on Columbus festival sets up this Saturday for the first installment of its three-weekend run, and showcases everything from fashion and jewelry to ceramics, toys, photography and fine artwork.

20th ANNUAL SPRING ANTIQUES SHOW, Bridgehampton Community House, Montauk Highway (Main Street), Bridgehampton, 516-868-2751. Saturday, April 28, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.; admission, $5.

SPRING CRAFTS ON COLUMBUS, Columbus Avenue from 77th Street to 81st Street and on 81st Street toward Central Park West, Manhattan, 212-866-2239. April 28-29, May 5-6 and 12-13, Saturday-Sunday, 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., rain or shine. Free admission.

Nautica Enterprises Inc. has agreed to buy trendy Los Angeles jeans maker Earl Jean Inc. In a cash-and-stock deal potentially worth about $ 65 million. Publicly traded Nautica will pay $ 45 million in cash and 1.12 million new shares of stock, according to a news release by the New York-based apparel company.

Based on Thursday's closing price of $ 17.61, the stock portion of the deal would be worth $ 19.7 million. The deal is expected to close by early May.

Founded in 1996, Earl Jean's $ 100 low-rise flared denims became the must-have jeans for affluent teens and young women, who snapped them up from high-end boutiques such as Fred Segal. Sales were $ 28.9 million in 2000, more than double 1999 sales of $ 13.8 million. The brand also is hot in Europe, Canada and Japan, which account for about half the company's sales.

Earl Jean will operate as a wholly owned subsidiary of Nautica, and co-founders Benjamin Freiwald and Suzanne Costas Freiwald will continue to oversee day-to-day operations. Nautica sells and designs a variety of sportswear. The company reported fourth-quarter net income of $ 13.1 million, up 30% from the previous year.

BODY:

CLIFTON, N.J.—Despite a 1.8 percent decline in comparable-store sales, Linens 'n Things had some good news in its first-quarter results.

The company expanded its gross margin by 50 basis points, and is making several changes in its merchandising strategy that may have a positive impact on its numbers for the remainder of the year.

Linens 'n Things' improvement in its gross margin is attributable in part to the company's long-term efforts to improve its logistics, having added a second distribution center in 1999. A reduced January clearance event was also a contributing factor, as were the better buying terms that the retailer can negotiate as its market share increases, according to a report by analyst Dan Wewer of Deutsche Banc Alex. Brown.

Other positives included an increase in average tickets. "As we look inside our four walls, we're encouraged by an increase in average transaction of 1 percent," said Steve Silverstein, president of Linens 'n Things.

And while the liquidation sales at 38 HomePlace units, half of which were in overlapping markets with Linens 'n Things, had a negative impact on the quarter, in the long term the retailer stands to gain from the decreased competition. "We're already seeing positive comp-store sales in those areas," Silverstein said.

The company opened 11 new stores in the first quarter, including one Canadian unit. The second quarter will see the opening of 16 new units that will be ready for the lucrative back-to-school season.

New stores are performing better than the plan of $ 150 to $ 175 per square foot, according to Bill Giles, vice president and chief financial officer. Giles said the strong showing is due to three initiatives: opening the stores with experienced staff, enhancing the grand opening marketing campaign and a better in-stock position.

The company has been remerchandising its stores, introducing some new categories while working to improve others. In a conference call for investors, Silverstein said that casual furniture and specialty foods, both new rollouts, were performing well. Decorative accessories are undergoing an overhaul, which is expected to be complete within the next eight to 10 weeks. "We saw a major opportunity to key into wall decor and some other businesses," said Silverstein. "You'll see major changes in those areas."

The company continues to expand its private-label program, and looks to reach its previously stated goal of 15 percent penetration by the end of 2001. "It will increase sales and improve margins," Silverstein said. "The focus of the proprietary business is to fill in gaps in the assortment, and to fill in areas not served by domestic suppliers. The expansion of the proprietary business is on plan and has been well received by guests."

Although the company does not break out numbers by category, it did state that textiles sales have been weak. It is implementing three strategies in an effort to bolster sales, including the introduction of Nautica Home, a new private-label solid-color towel program and strengthening the promotional offering in bedding.

If you shave every morning, do it right. A sterling silver safety razor that costs as much as a color TV starts your day with panache. (The one pictured here takes a Gillette Mach 3 blade.) Or for more heft, try the Vision, a German-made double-edged stainless-steel razor by Merkur. It's built like a Mercedes-Benz. Lathering up with a badger-bristle brush and lavender, mandarin orange or avocado oil soap in a bowl is a pleasant alternative to a palm full of aerosol foam. To put your best face forward, buy a two-sided mirror with magnification. You'll be surprised at how many whiskers you're missing. Braun's rechargeable model 7570 Syncro shaver is cordless and self-cleaning. It also features a digital display that alerts you to the number of minutes left on the charge (50 is max). There are face lotions and potions galore. We've selected some of the best, including Dr. Harris and Co.'s Arlington preshave ("a classic English fragrance for gentlemen"), Geo F. Trumper's West Indian Extract of Limes skin food and Nautica's aftershave gel (it comes in a tube that you can hang in the shower). If you sport whiskers, trim them with a pair of Corrado's supersharp mustache and beard scissors, which comes in a fitted case.

PROKARYOTIC BACTERIA reside in pools of water at Yellowstone Park whose temperatures can reach higher than 194 degrees. Humans, on the other hand, need a slightly more moderate environment. And since skin can go only so far, clothing has to step in to provide the necessary amount of comfort and protection. When you're in a location where thermostats are scarce, what kind of attire you bring can be the difference between actually enjoying the ancient ruins, or the boat ride down the river, or the hike through the forest, and being laid up in your hotel room with heat rash. These clothes help keep you comfortable by incorporating a number of useful features, like mesh linings, quick-dry fabrics, and ventilated backs. Until we evolve some more, wearing apparel like this is our best defense against some relatively inhospitable environments.

- 1 This pack melds the world of camping and that of the modern networked traveler. To wit, an internal pocket that is padded for your laptop. Not to mention another padded place for your PDA, a padded back, padded straps, and a belt to keep the things you carry in place. Nylon backpack ($ 75) by Timberland.
- 2 The world's a rough place, particularly where the feet meet the street--or the hiking trail. The multiple-density foam in the innersole of this shoe makes sure that your foot gets what it needs, where it needs it, when it hits the ground. Leather sneakers ($ 80) by Skechers.
- 3 This combo's good for a hike through Yellowstone or a hike to the video store. Multiple pockets on the pants and vest give you plenty of places to stow whatever you need to bring along with you, while serious cross-country shoes keep you on firm yet comfortable footing. Polyester fleece vest ($ 69), cotton T-shirt ($ 25), and cotton-and-nylon pants ($ 79) by Nautica; leather sneakers ($ 65) by Skechers.
- 4 Mesh pockets, like those featured on these trunks, may not seem like an important detail, but after you've been tossed around in the sandy surf, you'll appreciate how quickly they drain. And if you feel like letting your friends know how impressed you are with such utility, use this souped-up walkie-talkie, which has a range of up to two miles. Cotton-and-nylon swim trunks ($ 52) by Timberland; two-way radio ($ 75) by Motorola.
- 5 Instead of constantly replacing one season's au courant sunglasses with another, why not just buy a pair that look good all the time? And by the way, unless you're in the America's Cup, no Croakies. Tortoiseshell sunglasses ($ 130) by Timberland.

7 Even when it's sunny outside, your clothes should be more functional than the usual shorts, T-shirts, and flip-flops are. This jacket, while made out of your basic cotton, has been waxed to keep you dry. The boat shirt shown used to be all the rage in the '20s and '30s; it now has more-modern styling touches, like a fluorescent seam at the bottom. The way these shorts mix cotton and linen makes for a perfect blend of comfort and utility, not to mention the large patch pockets with extrawide openings that make getting your handheld GPS, multitool, or zinc oxide in and out of them much easier. And these sandals are meant for more than just a dash to the parking lot. With three different adjustable straps, finding the perfect fit is a cinch, and the ventilated toe, midsection, and heel offer enough drainage so that you can wear them both in and out of the water. Zip-front waxed-cotton jacket ($ 165), cotton crewneck ($ 50), and cotton-and-linen shorts ($ 60) by Tommy Hilfiger; running sandals ($ 100) by Teva.

8 Waterproof closures at the waist and cuffs have long been appreciated by paddlers. The neoprenelike material, along with Velcro, ensures that everything inside this pullover remains dry, no matter what the situation is outside. Grommets pockets on these shorts mean that water escapes from them with ease. The fact that these grommets are brass, and not just stitched, means they'll never unravel and become a hole in your seat. Nylon-and-polyester windbreaker ($ 98) and cotton-and-nylon drawstring shorts ($ 55) by Polo Sport; cotton polo shirt ($ 53), Polo by Ralph Lauren.

NIGHT TIME

Most watches have to be "charged" by daylight for their hands to glow. Others employ a button that can illuminate them temporarily. This little number uses micro gaslights made out of borosilicate glass capsules that illuminate the face continuously for twenty-five years. It was apparently nifty enough to capture the attention of the U. S. Navy SEALs, who have made it their standard-issue timepiece. Water-resistant watch ($ 270) by Luminox for L. L. Bean.

Name-brand clothing from $10 and up, a fast-talking radio voice blurted out. Then came the list of well-known designers and brands - Tommy Hilfiger, Nautica and others. Shoes, electronics, video games, computers, the excited voice continued.

That's what Sullivan, Brittany McKenney and Cecelia Grenga, both of Cicero, expected entering the World Discount Club sale Saturday at the Convention Center at Oncenter. They walked out without buying a thing, disappointed and feeling misled by the ads.

"I came for the clothes," Sullivan said. "I didn't expect to pay $5 to get in, or $4 to park."

Scores of customers leaving the sale expressed the same sentiment, some even after buying merchandise.

"It seemed to me like it was a Family Dollar Store in there," said Rynell Calloway, after walking out with a bag full of sheets and a painting.

The clothing vendor didn't show up, said Dipak Saga, show manager for the Michigan-based World Discount Club.

"Everybody here is an independent vendor," Saga said. "They tell us they're going to be here, and we advertise. If they don't show up, we're up a creek."

Saga refunded about $150 to people who complained, mostly because they came to buy clothing and it wasn't available, he said. About 2,300 people paid to enter the sale on Friday, which continues today. With five hours left before closing Saturday, another 1,900 customers had crossed the door.

On Friday, a sign outside the exhibit hall warned customers that there was no clothing, Saga said. He had an emergency shipment sent overnight to sell Saturday, he said.

But it wasn't what was advertised.

The Oncenter leased the space to the discount club and requires only that it follow the complex's rules, said Jerry Keohane, vice president and director of sales and marketing for the Oncenter. It had nothing to do with the marketing of the event. Keohane said he was aware of only one complaint, and that person received a refund.

Sullivan and her friends, who were looking for summer clothes, said the sale was a waste of time.

"We're going to the mall," she said, heading to the parking lot.

BYLINE: ELAINE WALKER, ewalker@herald.com

BODY:

With a population of more than 55 million and a buying power projected to reach up to $250 billion in the coming years, U.S. teens represent a major market for retailers.

That's why analyst Jeff Klinefelter is trying to get a handle on the buying preferences of the so-called Generation Y, which includes everyone born since 1978.

In an unusual move for a stock analyst, Klinefelter of U.S. Bancorp Piper Jaffray went on trips to the mall with about 300 high school students from 11 cities around the country, including Miami.

Klinefelter hopes that by learning what retail stores and brands teens prefer, he can stay a step ahead of the stock market.

"It seems to me that in today's competitive market, the best way to get an edge is to go right to the source: in this case, the teen consumers," said Klinefelter, who spent six years with Target Stores before becoming an analyst.

On his visit to Miami, Klinefelter took a group of students from Miami Senior High School to Aventura Mall. Both before and during the trip to the mall, the students were asked about their impressions on teen retailers like Gap, Limited, Pacific Sunwear, Guess, J. Crew, American Eagle, Bebe and Abercrombie & Fitch.

But the Miami teens seemed to buck many of the trends. The majority - 55 percent - said department stores are their favorite place to shop, compared with 31 percent for specialty stores and 14 percent for discount retailers. They rated their top three retailers as Burdines, Sears and Macy's.

Nationally, Klinefelter's survey found that 50 percent of teens prefer shopping in specialty stores, compared with 39 percent for department stores and 11 percent for discount retailers. They rated their top shopping destinations as Gap, Abercrombie & Fitch and Express.

Klinefelter was surprised by the popularity of department stores, which he discovered in both urban markets like Miami and smaller markets like Des Moines, Iowa. He attributed the popularity to convenient locations, heavy use of promotions and availability of premium brands like Nautica, Tommy Hilfiger and Polo.

"The message is that teens are not turning their backs on department stores," Klinefelter said. "If you have proprietary brands and they're well-positioned, you can attract these shoppers."

While teens considered Abercrombie & Fitch and Banana Republic as the most expensive apparel retailers, they were willing to pay the higher prices. The reason: They say the stores offer the latest in fashion trends.

That's particularly good news for retailers.

"These teens are well-educated consumers," Klinefelter said. "But as long as you're considered fashion-forward, you can warrant a higher price point."

The most popular fashion trends among teens: lots of denim in all washes and styles, halter tops and capri pants, 1970s and '80s retro, suede pants and the "preppy" look.

Other findings from Klinefelter's survey:

* Teens nationwide spend $110 per month on shopping. Miami teens spend $129, the second-highest in the survey behind Denver.

* Parents contribute about 50 percent toward teen apparel purchases. In Miami, the percentage of parental contribution was the highest of any market at 67 percent.

* Teens visit the mall only 2.5 times per month. Miami was slightly higher at 2.9 trips per month.

What does all this mean for Klinefelter and the stock market?

Based on his research, he is sticking with a strong buy rating on Abercrombie & Fitch and banking on a turnaround by the Gap during the second half of 2002.

He's also planning to conduct these surveys once every six months. US Bancorp Piper Jaffray may also launch a survey to check out the buying habits of "soccer moms." These women aged 35-55 represent one of the most sought-after demographic groups.

Elaine Walker's column on the retail and restaurant industries appears every other week.

BYLINE: By Andrea Lillo

BODY:

PARAMUS, NJ -- Previously a department store brand exclusively, Nautica is now charting new waters in the big box channel as its revamped home collection rolls out in Linens 'N Things and Bed Bath & Beyond simultaneously.

The timing of the program, hitting Bed Bath and LNT in early May, offered a rare opportunity for a side-by-side examination of their merchandising philosophies and execution. HTT visited LNT locations in Paramus and Totowa, NJ, a Bed Bath unit in Paramus and Bed Bath's 60th Street unit in Manhattan.

While both retailers carry nearly identical pricing on the line and offer many of the same skus, the merchandising treatment suggests that Nautica's place in their assortments serves different strategic ends for the rival chains.

As seen at both retail locations, Nautica is treated variously as a high-profile collection (LNT) or salted throughout the bedding department to broaden the scope of brand offerings (Bed Bath).

Linens 'N Things, which is installing Nautica as one of three key initiatives to drive top-line sales and boost margin in the textiles department, carries seven patterns at its Paramus location. The Nautica section is given high visibility, with placement off to the right of the main aisle of the store, and called out with suspended signage.

The heart of the Nautica section is a 20-foot long, floor-to-ceiling bay with three freestanding, double-sided 5' by 3' displays, and a display bed featuring the St. Tropez pattern. St. Tropez is also the lead pattern shelved on the bay, being placed nearest to the aisle, and followed by South of France, a bright blue floral; Crew, a red plaid; and Blackwatch, a blue and green plaid. Each has 4 feet of space stocked with coordinating sheets, comforters, decorative pillows, shams, cases and window treatments -- tab-top drapery for Blackwatch and valances for St. Tropez. Bedding from Croscill and Richloom lines the opposite run.

Three double-sided freestanding gondolas hold additional patterns. Montana, a red plaid pattern, faces the aisle and is merchandised with black denim items. A pinstripe pattern called Boardroom has duvets and shams and a coordinating blue window plaid 210-count sheet ($49.99 for a queen sheet). A 190-count coordinate to the 310-count St. Tropez sheet is also found here. The sides of the freestanding units display coordinating sheets and shams.

Nautica also makes an appearance in the general bedding area of the store, where a display bed dressed with the Cambridge plaid pattern is accompanied by a sign introducing the collection.

The Nautica set in Totowa is virtually identical, although its two dressed beds are featured back to back. Neither store had received the bath portion of the program at the time of HTT's visit.

In the nearby Bed Bath, the store calls attention to the arrival of the collection right at the front entrance, with a stand-alone sign introducing Nautica, above another sign introducing Wamsutta's Supima Cotton 320-count sheets.

Although Bed Bath puts Nautica on more beds than LNT -- four displays as opposed to two -- those beds are spread throughout the bedding department. Individual components such as sheets and comforters are merchandised by pattern in the vicinity of each display bed; but here, too, they are interspersed among bedding collections from other manufacturers, including Bay Linens, Laura Ashley and Sheridan.

The format suggests that Bed Bath is using Nautica to help pull traffic through the department rather than throwing a spotlight on the label as a featured brand.

However, the Paramus presentation stands in stark contrast to Bed Bath's merchandising of the program in Manhattan. There Nautica is given the department store treatment, merchandised in a stand-alone section approximately 16-feet wide and 12-feet deep, and anchored by a single bed dressed in the Blackwatch pattern. The Manhattan store carries more bedding patterns than the Paramus unit -- eight vs. five. And the store's four-sku program of shower curtains is cross-merchandised on one side of a four-way pole display in the bedding area. In addition, the Manhattan store's bath department features the Nautica program prominently, merchandising the shower curtains alongside two collections of Nautica-branded coordinate bath accessories.

In a further contrast, the Paramus store also offers several Nautica quilt patterns in the quilt area, something not seen in the Manhattan unit.

The bath collection in Paramus is not called out in any way in the bath area. The Cambridge and Indigo Blues fabric shower curtains fill almost three shelves, and the Ottoman, offered in white or navy twill, is stocked on a separate shelf. The store carries no bath accessories or window treatments.

Nautica pricing at both big boxes is similar, with pricing on twin sheets ranging from $9.99 to $14.99 and retail on queens from $31.99 to $44.99. The sole exception is the pricing on king-size shams, which LNT prices $5 less than Bed Bath's $49.99.

The program is still rolling out at both retailers, as well as at department store accounts, so the extent to which each treatment will ultimately differ from the other remains to be seen. As both companies weave the program into the mix, tweaking is likely to continue. But the early results suggest that Nautica is settling comfortably into its new channel.

For teen-agers, looking and dressing cool is important.

Take, for example, Plus Elegance in Mount Laurel. Owner Lois Moskowitz, 56, says her designer fashions for young girls are new to South Jersey.

'I came across a line of teen fashions I thought would be suitable for my granddaughter who is full-figured,' says Moskowitz, whose store opened in 1999, dedicated to women's fashions.

'This is a new concept in this area and I am the first one to do it,' she claims. 'And I want to remain exclusive for as long as possible.'

These fashions, she says, are in demand and they don't stay in her store long because they are so popular.

At Veronique boutique in Collingswood, owner Carol Girardi of Pennsauken, says many of her styles, although not specifically designed for teens, would be suitable for teen-age girls.

'I carry one of the young designers, Donna Ricco. Her designs incorporate a lot of ruffles, a lot of color.'

Girardi, a former plus-size model, adds that today's young women who are more athletic, for instance, don't fit into many of the tiny prom dresses found in shopping malls.

'We carry the most extensive amount of prom dresses. There are about a hundred to choose from.'

As far as teen-oriented casual styles go, Moskowitz boasts of having a wide assortment.

'We have jeans, bib-front overall shorts, jogging suits, tie-died shirts and skirts decorated with nice touches, like beads,' she says.

Although her line is mostly casual, last year she too carried a line of prom dresses that was so popular that she decided to try it again this year.

With shops like Plus Elegance and Veronique, there is no longer a need for today's teens to bury their bodies beneath oversized T-shirts and baggy jeans, both Moskowitz and Girardi say.

Although other stores like J.C. Penney and Sears carry Girls Plus and Boys Husky sizes, and Lane Bryant has Teen Plus, Moskowitz believes teens are still somewhat uncomfortable shopping these chains.

'At that age, they are intimidated' by having to shop among people who are two aisles away, searching through racks of size 6 jeans, she says.

'It's difficult to find upscale fashions for the full-figured,' Moskowitz says, adding that women bring their daughters and granddaughters from as far away as Philadelphia and Chestnut Hill to shop at her store specifically for that reason.

Because of the success of her teen-plus fashions, Moskowitz says she hopes to relocate soon to a larger space in the shopping center. There, she will have a section totally dedicated to teen-age girls, which she'll call Mariee's Closet.

Girardi, meanwhile, wants to help the young girls feel good about themselves. 'And,' she adds, 'we get a kick out of the young faces when they find a dress they really look good in.'

But what about the guys?

Although Sears and J.C. Penney, for example, carry a husky line for boys, the largest is size 20. Where do they go from there?

'As boys, they can shop chains that carry husky sizes. However, as teens they begin to dress differently,' says Jack Herschlag of the National Association of Mens Sportswear Buyers in New York City. 'For anything they need in tailored garments, they would go where their fathers shop - most likely men's big and tall stores. But if their choice of dress is basic, baggy pants, cargo pants, sweatshirts, things like that, they can go to most menswear stores and find what they are looking for.'

As far as designer fashions are concerned, Mark Rosenfeld of Torre Menswear in Philadelphia says, 'Today's young men want to dress nice. We carry designers like Tommy Hilfiger, Nautica and Sean John, the hottest line in the country today.'

At Torre, 'where size matters' as their logo claims, Rosenfeld says the store has the widest size range in the country, from a size 36 to 78.

'Young men seem to like vibrant sweaters like those designed by Coogi,' says Rosenfeld. He adds that at Torre, teens can purchase jeans made by the Polo Jean Company, as well as other designer fashions from the popular Mecca and Fubu Platinum lines. And for leather fashions, men of all sizes can purchase Pelle Pelle designs, he adds.

So, no matter what your size is, the opportunity to dress well is out there.

Random notes from wanderings across the retail landscape...

It's a fascinating time to shop the world of home textiles retail stores and departments.

What better time than when the long-awaited national launch of Donna Karan Home is rolling out. And what a difference in presentation and emphasis. Many involved in the launch report that the merchandise is selling extremely well. And these results come from a less-than-awesome rollout of the physical presentation -- due in part to lateness in construction.

The walls of stores are not made of elastic, and the shops for Donna's stuff had to be shoehorned into existing departments with some other items losing space and still others disappearing completely.

But still the overall impact of the presentation, with few exceptions, has not produced the WOW factor that one would expect from a collection of this caliber. Among the exceptions in presentation are Burdines at Dadeland and Macy's West.

Once again, signage and references to products available in other areas were the elements most often lacking. How is one to guess that a gorgeous bed might also have accessories or bath products as companions? We're looking forward to seeing the others in a completed state.

Similarly, the dual rollout of Nautica Home at both Linens 'N Things and Bed Bath & Beyond has produced some wide variables in presentation.

Unfortunately, neither of these powerhouse retailers put all their potential muscle behind the first real design program they have marketed.

Neither of these retailers used the Nautica brand to communicate the broad coordination and/or product availability within the stores.

Overall, a tour including stores in Chicagoland, Atlanta, Miami and Dallas, as well as the New York metro area, showed that Bed Bath was a tad ahead in terms of creating impact for bed and bath. LNT hung the shower curtains with other shower curtains, and in a number of stores, the bath products hadn't arrived. And, surprise, LNT also had a selection of tabletop, found only in that department.

Hopefully, as these retail giants become more adroit in making the most of multi-product programs, they will give the department stores a run for their money.

JAZZ, INCENSE, DEEP DISCOUNTS DRAW SHOPPERS TO OUTLET Hartford Courant (Connecticut) May 21, 2001 Monday, 1S NEW HAVEN COUNTY/SHORELINE

If you saw a 75 percent-off sign in front of a nice clothing store, you might be tempted to stop and shop. Although there's no such sign outside North Country Outlet on Boston Post Road in Westbrook, the deep discounts are easily found inside.

The clothes at North Country are many of the same featured in upscale catalogs such as J Jill, L.L. Bean and Eddie Bauer. A $200 L.L. Bean cashmere coat is marked down to $79, for example, and a $159 canvas barn jacket for $69. A J Jill cotton summer dress that retails for $139 goes for $39 at North Country. Leather belts from Field & Stream are $13. The labels are well known; Talbots, Abercrombie & Fitch, Express, Nautica and Calvin Klein.

"It's your average working class person's store because they get a lot of bang for their buck," said owner Elizabeth Rosenbloom. "It's product they're used to buying."

The savings become obvious when shoppers see a catalog clipping of the very same merchandise displayed next to the item on the Westbrook store rack. And nearly 99 percent of the outlet's merchandise is first quality, Rosenbloom said. She purchases clothes, bed linens and home decorative accessories from vendors, some of whom have exclusive contracts with popular retail chains.

The vendors have the first rights to buy merchandise that the retailer has bought too much of or is not selling as well as expected. Sometimes the labels are taken out of the merchandise before it gets to North Country Outlet but nevertheless it's usually easy to identify where it's from if you're a somewhat savvy shopper.

Stock turns over quickly. So what you find there this month will most likely be gone the next.

"I have people who like shopping in my store but wouldn't go to any outlet because it doesn't feel like an outlet store," Rosenbloom said.

Unlike T.J. Maxx, Marshalls and other discount clothing stores, there is a sensory appeal to shopping at North Country. On a recent visit to the store, shoppers could smell the aroma of peach incense, move to cool jazz tunes on the CD and run a hand across the smooth, 18th-century furniture from Mexico used for display.

"I think it's important to have one's surroundings be peaceful -- light, texture and scent are a part of someone's surroundings," Rosenbloom said.

It's a place she and her business partner, Rick Woodruff, are proud to have created because it's the type of store in which they like to shop.

"I could never work at a job where there wasn't passion involved," Rosenbloom said. "I'm passionate about my surroundings and I love to create."

When Rosenbloom opened the store last year, she threw herself into the venture without any worry of failure. She opened a North Country Outlet in Great Barrington, Mass., in August 1999, then the Westbrook store last year, at 1551 Boston Post Road in front of Water's Edge. She forged ahead in the retail business after her recent divorce and the need, she said, to support her children. Her smart business sense was honed after a stint as owner of the Penny Back Clothing Outlet in Torrington. But her tenacity and trail-blazing enthusiasm were most likely inherited.

"My great-aunt says I'm a throwback to my great-grandfather, Fred Barhoff," she said. "He developed the way to light up Niagara Falls and engineered ways to put lighting in trains and cars."

GRAPHIC: PHOTO; 1 Color; BOB MACDONNELL / THE HARTFORD COURANT; ELIZABETH ROSENBLOOM and Rick Woodruff are co-owners of North Country Outlet in Westbrook. The store, which opened last November, sells discounted clothing from well-known makers such as L.L. Bean and Abercrombie & Fitch. Rosenbloom also owns another outlet store in Great Barrington, Mass.

Harvey Sanders was only half joking. "I think I made one mistake tonight," said Sanders, the CEO of Nautica Enterprises, as he surveyed the crowd at the official opening party of the new Nautica store in Rockefeller Center on Thursday night. "I should have opened up the cash registers. I think we could have made a lot of sales."

Indeed. If all the fingering and fondling of Nautica's spring/summer merchandise was any indication, the gold cards would have been flying. Although the store opened its doors a month ago, the party marked the first visit for much of the star-studded crowd. The truly eclectic mix included Robert Kennedy Jr., football greats Boomer Esiason and Michael Strahan, style expert Elsa Klensch, news anchor Chuck Scarborough, Law & Order: SVU star Dann Florek, CFDA executive director Fern Mallis and Puffy's "Momma," Janice Combs.

Not to mention a virtual who's who of the men's fashion magazine world: Esquire's David Granger and Stefano Tonchi; GQ's Jim Moore; Maxim's Lance Ford, Stan Williams and Deborah Gould Rubin; and Men's Health's Brian Boye.

And the talk was as much about the space as it was about the merch. "I love the architecture; it's techy, but not too much," said Men's Journal fashion director John Mather of the 14,000-square-foot, bi-level emporium, adding that he was quite excited at the prospect of meeting the store's architect, Calvin Tsao.

"It was quite an undertaking. We took over two spaces," said David Chu, CEO, president and designer of Nautica International, who greeted guests in the men's area in back, which was once the Walter Reade Theater. (The rest of the space was fashioned from the old Bank of Boston building.) "But I'm very pleased and everything's coming along nicely."
