Genuine issues of material fact exist here. Apple cannot establish otherwise through unsupported say-so or by ignoring the facts themselves. But that is plainly Apple's strategy—even to the point of deliberately quoting the wrong part of a document, when the right part of the document is harmful to Apple's position. When the facts are measured against the law and viewed in the light most favorable to Maxell—as they must be here—there is no question that genuine disputes as to material facts remain.

I. Genuine Issues of Material Fact Remain Regarding Actual Notice

Apple again suggests that a party must explicitly allege infringement for actual notice to be found. Apple ignores the law. As Maxell showed in its Opposition, courts have held that an offer to license can be deemed actual notice because "[t]he whole point of offering a license is to insulate a licensee from infringement charges by the licensor." Gart v. Logitech, 254 F.3d 1334, 1346 (Fed. Cir. 2001). The June 2013 letter than the letters at issue in the cases Apple cited, which merely provided notice of ownership of the patents and, at most, invited the letter recipient to review the patent(s) to gauge any potential interest in a license which the patentee was willing to make available. Amsted Indus. Inc. v. Buckeye Steel Castings Co., 24 F.3d 178, 186-87 (Fed. Cir. 1994); Massachusetts Institute of Technology v. Abacus Software, Inc., No. 5:01-cv-344, 2004 WL 5268125, at *2 (E.D. Tex. Sept. 29, 2004). Here, the infringement assertion is clear enough from the fact that

This can mean nothing other than: Apple is infringing these patents and needs to take a license.

Apple's attempt to distinguish Maxell's cited case law by asserting that Gart, for example, found actual infringement where the need for a license was combined with additional infringement allegations (Reply at 2), fails as such a combination is also present here. As Maxell explained in detail, the June 2013 materials by Hitachi (and relied upon by Maxell in its Opposition) by pointing instead to a different portion of the June 2013 letter. ¹ Cf. Reply at 2 (quoting does not nullify that the June 2013 materials also contained everything required for actual notice— i.e. , it informed Apple of the identity of the patent and the activity that is believed to be an infringement and contained a proposal to abate the infringement. SRI Int'l, Inc. v. Advanced Tech. Labs., Inc., 127 F.3d 1462, 1470 (Fed. Cir. 1997).

Ignoring the disputed materials facts is not the same as having no disputed material facts.
