LIPEZ, Circuit Judge. In this copyright action involving ownership rights to the classic board game, The Game of Life, conveyed more than six decades ago, the prevailing defendants seek attorney's fees from the unsuccessful plaintiffs. The district court denied fees for the trial-level proceedings, and the defendants claim on appeal that the court abused its discretion in doing so. The defendants also moved in this court for appellate attorney's fees. The Copyright Act of 1976 permits the award of reasonable fees and costs to a prevailing party, see 17 U.S.C. § 505, and the Supreme Court has endorsed a set of nonexclusive factors to be considered by courts in evaluating whether to award fees, see Fogerty v. Fantasy, Inc., 510 U.S. 517, 534 & n.19 (1994). After carefully considering those factors and other aspects of the record, we affirm the district court's decision to deny fees and, primarily for the same reasons, decline to award fees for the appeal.

I.

As detailed in our opinion on the merits, this case arose from a long-running dispute between Reuben Klamer, a toy developer who originated the idea for The Game of Life, and Bill Markham, a game designer whom Klamer asked to design and build the game prototype. See Markham Concepts, Inc. v. Hasbro, Inc., 1 F.4th 74, 77-78 (1st Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 1414 (2022). The game was a huge success, and for decades following its debut in 1960, Markham and Klamer clashed over who should receive primary credit for its creation. In general, Markham "felt that he was not given proper public recognition for his role" and that the royalty he received was "unfairly low." Id. at 78-79.

Markham died in 1993. This case was brought by his successors-in-interest against Klamer, who has since died,¹ and others (including Hasbro, Inc., the company that now holds rights to The Game of Life) in an attempt, inter alia, to renegotiate the original assignment of rights in the game.² As the district court observed, the plaintiffs' copyright claim "boiled down to two dispositive questions: did Bill Markham create the [p]rototype (such that he could fairly be considered its author); and was the [p]rototype a work made for hire?" Markham Concepts, Inc. v. Hasbro, Inc., No. 15-419 WES, 2021 WL 5161772, at *1 (D.R.I. Nov.

² The litigation originally was brought by the Markham parties primarily as a contract action against Hasbro seeking reinstatement of their royalty payments, which had stopped because of an issue with an escrow arrangement. They subsequently amended their complaint to add additional causes of action against Klamer and other defendants, including the copyright claim adjudicated by the district court and addressed in our merits decision. See Markham Concepts, 1 F.4th at 77. The escrow issue was resolved, and the parties stipulated to dismissal of the non-copyright claims.
